PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 86th CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 6, 1960

The 6th day of January being the day prescribed by Public Law 305, 86th Congress, 1st session, for the meeting of the 2d session of the 86th Congress, the Senate assembled in its Chamber at the Capitol.

RICHARD M. NIXON, of California, Vice President of the United States, called the Senate to order at 12 o'clock meridian.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

Our Father God, with a new year's beginning, as the gavel falls again in this historic Chamber, even before we talk to one another about the Nation's welfare we would turn to Thee, O Thou God of our salvation—Thou who art greater and higher and deeper and more paramount than the sum of all other facts concerning our universe.

Tenderly and with deep sympathy we think in this hour of the dear ones bereaved by the passing of a stalwart Member of this body since the last session, and of an honored Senator standing this very morning in the poignant sadness of farewell as his lovely companion has so tragically, from our finite viewpoint, been taken from his side and his home.

Give them and us to see that what we call death is but the portal to a larger room in the Father's many-mansioned house.

We would with reverence climb the stairs of this altar of prayer our fathers built so long ago. A nation needs to pray for things it has—for things it has not earned—for gifts from men now dead. A nation needs to pray that in humility we see that greatness is not measured by industrial grandeur, nor by any other things that man may proudly say were made by mind or hand.

And so we pray to be delivered from the tyranny of things. We pray that no cherished resentment, no camouflaged selfishness, no small loyalties, no ingrained prejudice, may choke and clog the channels of public service. Take Thou the dimness of our souls away. Enlarge our spirits. Stretch out our horizons to meet and match the stupendous dimensions of these epic days.

Shall we repeat together the hallowed petitions of the Lord's Prayer?

Our Father, who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done, on earth as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread. And forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive those who trespass against us. And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil. For Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever.

Amen.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, for the information of the Senate, I should like to make two brief statements, and then suggest the absence of a quorum, prior to the swearing-in ceremony of our colleague from North Dakota.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas may proceed.

GREETING AND TRIBUTE TO SENATOR O'MAHONEY

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. First, Mr. President, I know that every Senator in this Chamber is delighted to welcome back to the Senate today the distinguished and able senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY]. [Applause, Senators rising.]

It is a great pleasure to have him here with us, fully recovered, and ready to exercise his keen and penetrating mind and the vigor he always demonstrates in his actions in behalf of this great country of ours. His statesmanship has been missed and will be very necessary in the days to come.

Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas.

DEATH OF MRS. STROM THURMOND

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I believe that most of us have today heard of the great tragedy that came this morning to our colleague the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND]. I know all of us share his deep sorrow in the loss of the lovely lady who was his wife, and whom every Member of the Senate appreciated for the great person she was.

There is little any of us can say that is really comforting at a time like this. But the knowledge that all the Members of the Senate and all of his numerous friends throughout the Nation are thinking of him and praying for him may bring him some solace.

I yield now to the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON].

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, the people and the Nation this morning were shocked and saddened to learn of the extremely untimely death of Mrs. Strom Thurmond, the wife of my distinguished colleague.

We cannot adequately express our grief at the suffering and the agony her husband and her immediate family must endure at this sad hour. I join with people everywhere—as we were joined before in prayer for her recovery—in expressing sympathy to her husband and her family. The loss of this sweet and beautiful woman will be a cause of sorrow to every person who ever knew her.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, this opening day of Congress is always one which is marked by the pleasure of meeting again all our friends on the floor of the Senate before we begin consideration of matters vital to the domestic and international welfare of our Nation.

This day, however, is clouded with sadness because of the passing this morning of Jean Thurmond, the beloved wife of our good friend and colleague, the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND]. It is difficult for most of us to realize the sorrow and shock experienced this day by Senator THURMOND, but I am sure all of us want him to know how deeply we feel the loss of a dear lady.

In the short time Jean had been in Washington, she endeared herself to thousands of people in the same charming manner in which she won the love of the citizens of South Carolina.

Mrs. Bridges and I join the many thousands of friends of Jean and STROM THURMOND in an expression of sympathy to a fine Senator and colleague and a devoted husband.

DEATH OF SENATOR WILLIAM LANGER, OF NORTH DAKOTA

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. President, it is my sad duty formally and officially to announce to the Senate the death, during the adjournment of Congress, of my late colleague, the Honorable WILLIAM LANGER, U.S. Senator from North Dakota.

Senator LANGER had a long and distinguished record as a public servant, covering a period of nearly half a century. At the age of 29 he was elected attorney general of North Dakota. Later he served two terms as Governor of North Dakota, and was a member of the U.S. Senate for nearly 19 years.

Senator LANGER was a very able and respected member of this body. I know of no public servant who was more devoted to duty or more courageous in fighting for causes which he believed to be right. He was always to be found on the side of the poor man, the underprivileged, or those in trouble. These and many other fine qualities earned for him the respect and admiration of all his associates.

At a later date, when, as I understand, the Senate will set aside a day on which the Members of the Senate may pay their respects to its deceased Members, I shall have some additional remarks to make in the form of a eulogy. At this time I shall only submit a resolution, for present consideration of which I ask unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The legislative clerk (Edward E. Mansur, Jr.) read the resolution (S. Res. 203) as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow and deep regret the announcement of the death of Hon. WILLIAM LANGER, late a Senator from the State of North Dakota.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the Senate, at the conclusion of its business today, do adjourn.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, prior to action on the resolution, I should like to announce, for the information of the Senate, that I have worked out an agreement with the minority leader that at an early date a time will be set aside, advance notice of which will be given to all Senators, when proper tribute may be paid to the late Senator LANGER.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered by unanimous consent and unanimously agreed to.

SENATOR FROM NORTH DAKOTA

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. President, I have the credentials of the Honorable NORMAN BRUNSDALE, who has been appointed to serve in the Senate from now until the election on June 27 of a successor to the late Senator LANGER.

The certificate of appointment was read, and ordered to be placed on file, as follows:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
STATE OF NORTH DAKOTA.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES:

This is to certify that, pursuant to the power vested in me by the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the State of North Dakota, I, John E. Davis, the Governor of said State, do hereby appoint NORMAN BRUNSDALE a Senator from said State to represent said State in the Senate of the United States until the vacancy therein, caused by the death of William Langer, is filled by election, as provided by law.

Witness: His Excellency our Governor John E. Davis, and our seal hereto affixed at Bismarck, this 19th day of November, in the year of our Lord 1959.

JOHN E. DAVIS,
Governor.

By the Governor:
[SEAL]
BEN MEIER,
Secretary of State.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. President, the Senator designate is present and ready to take the oath of office.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator designate will present himself at the desk, the oath will be administered to him.

Mr. BRUNSDALE, escorted by Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota, advanced to the Vice President's desk, and the oath of office prescribed by law was administered to him by the Vice President, and was subscribed by him.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 204), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee consisting of two Senators be appointed by the Vice President to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each House is assembled and that the Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair appoints the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] as the members of the committee on the part of the Senate.

NOTIFICATION TO THE HOUSE

Mr. DIRKSEN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 205), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled and that the Senate is ready to proceed to business.

HOUR OF DAILY MEETING

Mr. MANSFIELD submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 206), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the hour of daily meeting of the Senate be 12 o'clock meridian unless otherwise ordered.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I should like to inform the Senate that the Senate will meet tomorrow and proceed to the other body to hear the President's state of the Union message.

Following the completion of the delivery of that message, the Senate will return to its Chamber and have the regular morning hour for the introduction of bills and the presentation of memorials and petitions, and for such statements as Senators may care to make.

The minority caucus will be held this afternoon.

I have reviewed with the minority leader the several bills which are now on the calendar, some of which have already been cleared for consideration by the policy committee. As to other bills, the policy committee will meet at an early date and act upon them.

We shall have a very heavy workload this session, and if we are to complete our labors by July, when the first national party convention is to be held, it will be necessary, I think, for the committees to meet earlier than usual and to remain in session later than usual, and for the Senate to stay in session in the evenings during some of the period of February, March, and April, which it is not the custom of the Senate to do.

I appeal to each Member of the Senate to cooperate in arranging the schedule so that we can act upon all the proposed legislation which needs to be considered with proper deliberation and dispatch.

Generally speaking, we will consider the bills which are on the calendar in the order in which they appear on the calendar. There will be many exceptions to that in cases of emergency, but that will be the general rule.

Following the meetings of the caucuses and of the policy committee I shall make a detailed statement to the Senate about the kind of proposed legislation it is expected the Senate will have before it next week.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the distinguished majority leader yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to my friend from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I simply desire to inform the minority Members that the conference of Republican Senators is set for 2:30 this afternoon, in the usual conference room.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. And I should like the majority Members to be reminded that we shall have our caucus at 3:30 tomorrow afternoon.

Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, pursuant to the resolution previously agreed to, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the late Senator LANGER, I move that the Senate stand in adjournment until tomorrow.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 24 minutes p.m.) the Senate, as a further mark of respect to the late Senator LANGER, adjourned until tomorrow, Thursday, January 7, 1960, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 6, 1960

This being the day fixed by Public Law No. 305, 86th Congress, enacted pursuant to the 20th amendment to the Constitution, for the meeting of the 2d session of the 86th Congress, the Members of the House of Representatives of the 86th Congress met in their Hall, and at 12 o'clock noon were called to order by the Speaker, Hon. SAM RAYBURN, a Representative from the State of Texas.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Psalm 124: 8: Our help is in the name of the Lord.

O Thou who hast opened unto us the gateway to a new year, we are earnestly seeking Thy divine guidance and strength as we enter upon this 2d session of the 86th Congress.

We beseech Thee to lay Thy hands of blessing and benediction upon our President, our Speaker, the Members of this legislative body, and all who are serving our beloved country in whatever capacity.

May our minds and hearts be the sanctuaries of Thy presence and the channels of Thy power.

Grant that when difficult problems and decisions throw all their weight against us we may lean hard upon Thee for help and learn the secret of victorious living.

Hear us as we bow in adoration and unite in offering unto Thee the prayer of the Prince of Peace, our Lord and Saviour.

Our Father, who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name, Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done, on earth, as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread, and forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors. And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil. For Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever.

Amen.

THE WHITE HOUSE, September 14, 1959.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Clerk of the House of Representatives:

JANUARY 6, 1960.

The Honorable the SPEAKER,
House of Representatives.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a sealed envelope addressed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives from the President of the United States, received in the Clerk's office at 12:05 p.m., on October 20, 1959, and said to contain the 15th semiannual report on the operation of the mutual security program for the period ending December 31, 1958.

Respectfully yours,

RALPH R. ROBERTS,
Clerk, U.S. House of Representatives.

SEMIANNUAL REPORT, MUTUAL SECURITY PROGRAM—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 231)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

Transmitted herewith is the 15th semiannual report on the operations of the mutual security program for the period ending December 31, 1958. The report was prepared by the Coordinator of mutual security program, with participation by the Department of State (including the International Cooperation Administration), the Department of Defense, and the Development Loan Fund.

The essence of our experience during the 7½ years of the program on which reports have been transmitted to the Congress, is that the mutual security system is vital to our national security. If we do not persist in the continuous and vigorous application of military, economic, and technical programs making up the mutual security system, our foreign policy will be rendered ineffective. This ultimately cannot fail to have the most serious consequences for every living American.

If we fail to win the contest in which we are now engaged, the potential destruction of our way of life becomes, by the degree of our failure, more and more a dangerous reality. It behooves us all to keep this peril fresh in our minds.

I trust that this report will provide a yardstick to evaluate the measures we and other members of the great community of nations are taking in the mutual security program to defend our freedoms.

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, October 19, 1959.

WITHDRAWAL AS DELEGATE TO NATO PARLIAMENTARY CONFERENCE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication, which was read:

OCTOBER 14, 1959.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
The Speaker,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: At the time of your gracious appointment of me as a Delegate to the NATO Interparliamentary Conference, I was not aware that the same would be held at a time when it would be impossible for me to attend because of other responsibilities undertaken for the House Foreign Affairs Committee.

May I respectfully, therefore, ask that someone else for this year of 1959 be appointed in my place.

With deep appreciation of the honor conferred by the appointment and even deeper regret that circumstances beyond my control prevent my attendance, I am,

Sincerely yours,

MARGUERITE STITT CHURCH.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, your committee on the part of the House to join a like committee on the part of the Senate to notify the President of the United States that a quorum of each House has been assembled and is ready to receive any communication that he may be pleased to make has performed that duty. The Clerk read the concurrent resolution as follows:

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

ANNOUNCEMENT

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to make an announcement.

After consultation with the majority and minority leaders, and remembering the terrific jams we have had on the floor on occasion of joint sessions of the Congress, with the consent and approval of the floor leaders the Chair announces that on tomorrow the doors immediately opposite the Speaker will be open and the doors on the Speaker's left and right, and none other.

No one will be allowed on the floor of the House who does not have the privilege of the floor of the House.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include therein certain information, and further that in connection with the subject I shall discuss all Members who may desire to do so may extend their remarks in the RECORD today, and other Members may have 5 legislative days in which to do so.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

HON. SAM RAYBURN

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, the American experiment in government from its inception to the present time is the most original and unique in history. From an infant nation our country has steadily progressed until today it is the most powerful and influential nation in the world, and particularly dedicated to peace on earth.

In the making of our history names of great men and women in all walks of life stand out with prominence. In the field of government, legislative, executive, and judicial, great figures are recorded in our history. It is hard to distinguish in the lifetime of any man what his place in history will be. The emotions of living generations preclude the human mind interpreting correctly beyond that one lifetime what place a man will hold in history. That usually lies with the historians of tomorrow. But in our time there is one man we can pick out who stands out in our minds and in the minds of the people as a man of history, particularly on the constructive side of life and the constructive side of history. His birthday anniversary is celebrated today.

I refer to that great American, not only a son of Texas but a citizen of and respected and loved throughout the United States, a man with a heart of gold, our beloved Speaker, SAM RAYBURN. Our country has been enriched by the services of SAM RAYBURN. You and I and all others who have had the honor of knowing him either as friends or through association with him are better persons because of our friendship and our association with our beloved Speaker. I know, too, that I express the sentiment of all our colleagues and of the American people, whether they know the Speaker personally or not, particularly the people of his own congressional district who have honored him for so many years, when I say that in extending to him our congratulations we sincerely hope that God in His infinite wisdom will continue to bestow upon SAM RAYBURN for many, many years to come an abundance of His choicest blessings, and that he will still be presiding over the House of Representatives. And, in order to make it complete, that he will still be a Member of the House of Representatives.

The following shows the record of Mr. Speaker RAYBURN, of Texas, as Speaker of the House of Representatives as compared to the service of Speaker Henry Clay, of Kentucky:

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to my distinguished friend, the gentleman from Indiana, the Republican leader of the House.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I should like to say at the outset that the ovation tendered to Speaker RAYBURN when he first called the House to order today is clear evidence of the deep affection we all have for him. And so happy am I to join my colleagues on this occasion—this is not bipartisan—it is not nonpartisan; it is just a genuine expression of gratitude and admiration for our great Speaker RAYBURN. I must say that while I heartily put my stamp of approval on just about everything the majority leader has said about our Speaker, I cannot quite go along with his statement that he just be Speaker of the House forever.

But, having said that, may I simply say again that it has been a great pleasure to work with SAM RAYBURN. I have now been here approximately 25 years—not as long as some—but through that time we have all witnessed his very faithfull devotion to his duties as Speaker of the House of Representatives. I have felt the warmth of his personal friendship. Believe me, I appreciate it as I am sure everyone here does.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, the responsibilities and duties of the Speaker of the House of Representatives are appreciated by all of us, but they can be most effectively appreciated by one who has been Speaker of this House. To me, the Presiding Officer of the House of Representatives is one of the great figures of America—no matter what party he is a member of. Every Speaker I have served under has performed his trust in carrying out the rules of the House with fairness and without regard to party or partisan considerations, deciding the questions that arise under parliamentary law in accordance with that law and in accordance with the rules of the House and protecting the rights of all Members. We all pay our respects to our distinguished friend and former Speaker of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts, my dear friend, JOE MARTIN, as a great Speaker who has presided with eminent fairness and justice to all Members.

I now yield to the distinguished former Speaker of the House.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, and my colleagues, it is a great privilege to have the opportunity, even for a few moments, to pay my respects to a dear friend, an old friend and a Member whose friendship has lasted over 35 years without a jarring note. It has been my privilege to know SAM RAYBURN all these years, and I can testify, as few men can testify, to his rugged Americanism, his loyalty to country and his intense desire above everything else to maintain the high honor and the integrity of the House of Representatives. There have been many times when other branches of the Government have tried to encroach upon the prerogatives of the House of Representatives, but as long as we have had SAM RAYBURN in the Speaker's chair, we know that the rights of the House have been ably and adequately defended, and that never while he is Speaker will the rights and integrity of the House of Representatives be sacrificed.

As my good friend, the majority leader, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK], has well said, Mr. RAYBURN has been a Member longer than anyone else.

All these have been very eventful years. They have been years of great trial; years which, if we did not have men like SAM RAYBURN at the helm, America would not be the forward going, progressive country that it is today. I thank God that we have had SAM RAYBURN as Speaker. His services for his country will never be forgotten.

I want to pay particular tribute to his great service in behalf of constitutional government, a government of laws and not of men. May I wish SAM many happy returns of the day. May he have a pleasant birthday and may the years hereafter bring him the very best of health and may they bring increased opportunity to serve not only his country but all of humanity.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. ROGERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I rise today on behalf of the Texas delegation to say "happy birthday" to you and to pay you the deserved tribute to which a great man is entitled. It was my distinction, and one, let me say, of which I am justly proud, to have had you as my Representative in Congress, during the early years of my life. For many years you represented my family, and most recently my mother, who passed away a few years ago. I do not think anyone in any district in this United States of America was more proud of you than my family. I know the same would have been true with every other Member of the Texas delegation who is in Congress today or who has served in the past, or, I may say, who may come in the future. Texas is proud of you, and justly so. You have proven that man can live by law, if those laws are based on fairness, justice, and equity. You have been the exemplification of decency and fair dealing. I think that the history books will record your great contributions in this respect as the outstanding contributions in this era, on achievements that will challenge future generations.

The greatness of most men is measured by plaques, awards, and other material presentations. I am sure you have plenty of those. I know of many. But I think the truest measure of greatness is the respect and devotion which one man bears for another. In your case, a respect and devotion indelibly imprinted in the minds of those men and women who have had the good fortune to know you and have had an opportunity to serve with you. There is no one who knows you or who has ever been associated with you who does not know that when you say you will do something, it will be done.

I do not think any greater tribute can be paid to any man.

As a great American, a great statesman and a great Texan, the Texas delegation is deeply honored to have you as our leader. We wish you a happy birthday, and we are going to look forward to repeating this ceremony for many years to come.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, one of the many emoluments which accrue to us as Members of this body is the association with men from all sections of the Nation—men who have been carefully selected and screened by the inexorable processes of political preferment and who come to us here as representatives of the industry, the geographical area, and the people for whom they speak. Here are developed friendships and associations and influences which remain with us through life.

The friendship of men like Speaker RAYBURN has touched and enriched the service of every man who has served with him. And, in turn, he has, without exception, been the friend of every man who has served with him in the Congress.

It has been my good fortune to be associated with him here longer than any other Member of this House. I was present and saw him sworn in as a Member of Congress for the first time. And have seen him sworn in, or been sworn in by him, in every succeeding Congress.

I have seen 10 Speakers in that chair. All of them men exceptionally qualified for the duties of that high office. And of all of the 10 Speakers with whom it has been my privilege to be personally associated, and with the long line of illustrious men who preceded him and whose decisions it has been my privilege to read, there is none who, in my opinion, ranks higher not only in the discharge of the technical duties of his office, but certainly in those greater attributes of heart and mind which have distinguished all of them than the great Speaker who presides here today and who has occupied that position longer than any other man in American history.

Mr. Speaker, I do not speak of SAM RAYBURN as a partisan or even as a member of any one party, because it necessarily follows that as Speaker of the House he is the titular leader of our branch of the Government. He speaks for America. The term of his extended speakership covers one of the most critical periods in world history. He has had to deal with many exacting problems, because the Government during that period has been confronted with some of the most difficult problems in the short history of the Nation. In these critical situations he has represented not only his own party to which he has been always loyal, but all Members of the House and every American citizen. And his record through these trying times has been one of which every Member of the House can be justly proud.

We wish for him many happy returns of the day. And we wish for him and the country many more years of devoted service as Speaker.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the minority whip, the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARENDS].

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts for yielding to me. Might I say those of us who do not happen to live in Texas or who have not been there over a period of years take with a grain of salt, probably, some of the tall stories that have been told of Texas and Texans; but let me say that to hear and see the demonstration that today has been accorded to our beloved Speaker leaves no doubt in the mind of anyone that Texas has raised an outstanding No. 1 statesman in the person by the name of SAM RAYBURN. I believe all of us, whether we come from Texas or not, can agree that in the person of the great Speaker SAM RAYBURN, Texas has sent us her greatest man.

Let me say before proceeding further that I can best express myself by simply saying "Amen" to what has been said, to the many fine tributes already paid to you today on your anniversary, and I hope the years ahead will, as they have in the past, fall lightly on your shoulders. This was very forcefully brought home to me when I attended a celebration in my district not long ago for a man who was 100 years old. There was another elderly man sitting at the table behind me. I turned and asked him how old he was. He said he was 90. I asked him if he was enjoying the evening. He said, "Yes, but things are dragging out too long here; I am worried about this old gentleman who is 100 years old." Here we have the example of relativity, for a man 90 was worrying not for himself but about the man who was 100 years old.

It is my personal wish that you may be spared for many, many years of continued useful service, and that you will preside here whenever your party is in power, but aside from politics, as an expression of friendship, speaking for myself, and I am sure for all other Members of this body, we wish you many years of happiness and health, and express our great appreciation of the services you have rendered your State and your country.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the distinguished gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOGGS].

Mr. BOGGS. Mr. Speaker, on previous occasions of your birthday I have recited to the House the long legislative history of yourself. We have now run out of comparisons. You have exceeded the record of any man who ever served in the House of Representatives. Therefore, the only comparisons now that can be made are with distinguished British parliamentarians, such as Gladstone, Balfour, and Churchill.

But today, for just one moment, rather than delve into history—because you, Mr. Speaker, are already a part of history—I should like to tell the Members that a week ago I had the great privilege of traveling to Mr. RAYBURN'S home district and participating there in a testimonal luncheon accorded him by his constituents. This was a very heartwarming demonstration by the people that Speaker RAYBURN has so well represented for a half century. The testimonial was sponsored by the civic clubs of Sherman, Tex.; and despite the fact that they had the largest place in the city of Sherman, namely, the auditorium, it was impossible for a great many people to obtain seats. As a matter of fact, some of my distinguished colleagues from Texas gave their seats to people I brought from my State of Louisiana.

I think the real tribute was in the fact that the people the Speaker has served for 50 years were willing to turn out and give him this magnificent testimonial. I think all of the people there thought, as I did, as these beautiful speeches were made, that despite the fact this great man has had to make decisions affecting all of mankind in two great wars and under many Presidents, both Democratic and Republican, he has never been too busy to serve the people who have honored him by electing him so many times to high public office.

It was my privilege then, and it is my privilege today, to join with them in saying "Happy birthday to you."

I think a significant thing appeared in a news article in his hometown paper, to the effect that when the heat of debate was over and the session was ended the Speaker never went on a trip. He always went back home.

Happy birthday to you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, as the concluding speaker I shall recognize in the performance of my duties as majority leader, I yield to my real right arm, the distinguished Democratic whip, my very dear friend, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. ALBERT].

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to join all Members of the House today in paying tribute to our great Speaker, a giant of a man whose stature grows with each passing year. I refer to his stature as a statesman and not to his physical stature, because as he stated at his press conference this morning he weighs exactly the same today as he did 40 years ago, and that with his winter clothes on.

Along with the distinguished gentleman from Louisiana, and many other Members of the House and Senate, it was my privilege last week to go to Sherman, Tex., when a tremendous tribute was paid the Speaker by the citizens of that community and of his congressional district. A number of my constituents were also present for the occasion.

I was happy to read in one of the newspapers from my district only this morning an editorial by Ennis M. DeWeese of Hugo, Okla., in the Southeast Oklahoman of December 31, 1959, which I think expresses the attitude of the people of my State.

This editorial is as follows:

> What was said in praise of SAM RAYBURN at the appreciation banquet for the veteran Speaker of the House at Sherman, Tex., Wednesday night was well deserved.
> SAM RAYBURN is a big man because he has brains—plain old horse sense to an unusual degree—and he has never lost the common touch.
> MR. SAM, to use a homely expression, "knows the human critter and understands what makes him tick." He's the sort of realist for whom the need is ever present.
> He certainly deserves to be rated among the greatest men in the legislative branch of Government since the Federal Union was formed.

Mr. Speaker, the distinguished gentleman from Louisiana has referred to an article appearing in the Sherman Democrat of December 29, which contains a splendid portrait of the Speaker, and with leave of the distinguished gentleman, I shall include this as a part of my remarks.

It is as follows:

SAM RAYBURN: A LEGEND IN HIS OWN LIFETIME

WASHINGTON.—SAM RAYBURN of Flag Springs, Fannin County, Tex., and more recently of Bonham, belongs to a rare category of human beings—

He has become a legend in his own lifetime.

For a whole generation national writers have told the story of his records as a public official and the many laws he has fathered to improve the daily lives of the plain people of America in whom he has a passionate, almost religious faith.

Many people know that he has been Speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives 17 years—longer than any man in history—and almost twice as long as Henry Clay;

He has served more years in the House of Representatives than any man since this Democracy was born;

He has helped to guide the United States through its two greatest wars, its greatest prosperity, and its greatest depression.

A lot of people know some of his legislative achievements. The REA, which brought electricity to almost all the farms of America; the farm-to-market road program which is lifting the farmer out of the mud; the regulation of Wall Street which protected the savings of millions of people when invested in stocks and bonds; GI insurance and the veterans disability payments which have helped every American soldier and his family since 1917; soil conservation and flood control measures to help save the priceless heritage of the soil so that unborn generations of Americans may continue to eat abundantly—these are a few of the Rayburn accomplishments in the Halls of Congress, which affect the daily welfare of all Americans.

NO PUBLICITY MAN

But in spite of this knowledge of his records and his accomplishments, many people have only a hazy idea of what kind of a human being this man is.

For this RAYBURN himself is largely responsible. Most men in public life seek, even crave, every bit of publicity they can manage.

Not so with RAYBURN.

He has never had a "publicity man" on his staff.

He is probably the only official in Washington who is brusque with news photographers, letting them take 1 or 2 pictures, then ordering them, "That's all, boys—no more pictures."

He has steadfastly refused to write the story of his eventful life.

He seldom makes a speech in Congress.

Once he complimented an associate by saying, "He doesn't run around getting his name in the newspapers."

Well, what kind of a human being is SAM RAYBURN?

First, he is a simple, even old-fashioned man.

He dresses conservatively, hates loud clothes and hats and ties, both for himself and for others.

LIKES PLAIN FOOD

A hearty eater, he finds no pleasure in "frilly" dishes. Once, on his way back from Washington, he phoned his mother. She asked what he wanted for supper that night. "Crumb-in," he said—cold cornbread crumbled in sweet milk. He got it.

Pork shoulder, chicken fried in hog lard, white onions, scrambled eggs, chili without beans, vanilla ice cream, beefsteak, snap beans, toast, giblet gravy on hot biscuits, and always cornbread—these constitute his idea of "real eating."

In Washington he has lived in the same small, comfortable apartment for more than 30 years.

He still drives—and personally dusts and shines—the 1947 Cadillac which the Democratic Congressmen took up a collection to give him nearly 13 years ago.

His conversation is couched in the simple, homespun, Anglo-Saxon words he learned around his father's fireside south of Windom. He intensely dislikes what he calls those five-cylinder words. When he speaks, everyone understands exactly what he means.

IN ROBUST HEALTH

He is one man who has never had any desire to go abroad. When Congress adjourns, there is only one place he wants to go—and does go—home.

SAM RAYBURN has enjoyed an unusual robustness of health.

He has never been in a hospital except to have his tonsils removed.

He has never had a headache.

When Congress adjourned this year, it worked through the entire night and finally called it quits at 6:36 a.m. RAYBURN was up all night presiding over the House of Representatives, yet he was back at his office at 11 a.m., worked all day seeing a constant stream of visitors, and then went to a White House dinner that night. The next day he was at his office bright and early.

Undoubtedly his own health habits have contributed to this robustness. He rarely misses staying in bed 9 hours every night. He eats very temperately. He loves to walk, and if the weather is bad, he gets his exercise by walking back and forth throughout the huge Capitol Building.

HONEY HIS MEDICINE

Sunshine, he believes, is great medicine, and he likes to walk or sit in the sun for long hours.

And honey to him is medicine. Every morning he has honey for breakfast.

When he goes to bed, he goes right to sleep. "If I can't do my job standing up, I danged sure can't do it lying on my back and worrying about it," he explains.

SAM RAYBURN is a man full of restless energy.

Part of this comes from his natural vitality and good health. The rest comes from his training.

He was 1 of 11 children in a poor family. Every member of the family had to work hard in order to make ends meet. He was taught not only that work was necessary, but that it was honorable.

Then he went to Professor Mayo's East Texas Normal, the forerunner of East Texas State College at Commerce. There he fell under the spell of one of the greatest influences of his life, William Leonidas Mayo, an inspired man who gave more Texas boys and girls from poor families a chance to get ahead than any man of record.

LIKES HARD WORK

"During the morning exercises, Professor Mayo was the most inspiring man I ever knew," RAYBURN said 53 years later. "He made a student feel like a criminal if he did not work, and not only that, but work to his utmost capacity."

This habit of incessant work he has never abandoned. On most holidays, when the Capitol is deserted except for tourists, he comes to his office and if there is no mail to answer and no visitors to see, he is restless as a bear and makes some kind of work.

To his staff, one of his trademarks is—"Let's do it now." Often at the end of a tiring day, a staff assistant will say, "I want to discuss this with you, but I'll wait until tomorrow." His stock reply is: "No; let's do it now."

He works quickly, restlessly, tersely.

Most of his telephone conversations, whether they be with the President or a rank stranger, are never over 2 or 3 minutes long. He detests receiving a long letter, and almost never writes one longer than a page. Congressmen come to see him with a complicated problem, but he gives his decision quickly, firmly, and normally the conference is completed in 5 or 10 minutes.

HATES WASTEFULNESS

That is one of the reasons why Washington newspapermen say that he sees more people in a day than any other high official in the Nation's Capital.

Waste, whether it be of time or natural resources or human talent, pains him.

"It just hurts me to see soil washing away," he once told a visitor. "I love the dirt."

Talking of a young man of great talent who had not used it, he commented sadly, "It's a shame, but he just didn't have a program."

He believes religiously that every person should set for himself an aim early in life and then work without ceasing until he has reached his goal.

That was his own program in life. When he was a child, perhaps 8 or 9 years old, in the cotton fields of Fannin County, he made up his mind that some day he was going to make a lawyer and go to Congress and be Speaker of the House. He never let go of the dream.

DEATH BEFORE FAILURE

"I would rather have died than to have failed," he said years later. He firmly believes that every person can achieve his goal in life if he makes up his mind early and never stops working toward it.

To many observers, much of RAYBURN'S success came from his universal reputation for candor and telling the truth.

A newspaperman once said to him, "Mr. Speaker, you see a hundred people a day with problems and you tell them what you will do and won't do or that you'll think about it. But I never see you making notes on what you tell them, yet you never seem to forget. What is your secret?"

RAYBURN'S hot, brown eyes, flashed.

"If you tell the truth the first time, then you don't have to remember," he shot back.

Another time he said: "Tell the truth first and save later explanations."

Presidents and other high officials sometimes find it difficult to get honest opinions because many people try to tailor their advice to what they think the high official wants to hear.

LAYS IT ON THE LINE

Not so with RAYBURN.

When they ask RAYBURN for advice, he lays it on the line. This frankness under all circumstances has made him a much-sought adviser.

Perhaps this explains much of his great popularity with the Washington press corps. Often he will tell newsmen: "I don't want to talk about that," in reply to their questions, but when he does say something, they know it is the complete truth as RAYBURN sees it.

Along with his candor, a frequently mentioned trait is RAYBURN'S fairness.

Many Democrats and Republicans differ with him on political questions, but they are virtually unanimous in praising his fairness. Even, when the House of Representatives is considering a bill to which he is strongly opposed the supporters of the bill are given every break to which they are entitled under the House rules.

"The greatest ambition a man can have is to be known as a just man," he once said.

"Be just—be fair," he says over and over again in advising people.

SPIRIT OF FAIRNESS

"Laws should never be passed to punish someone or to give someone an unfair advantage. Every law should be passed in a spirit of fairness," he frequently declares.

And whenever a bill comes up which he thinks was designed to punish someone, he emphatically votes "No."

This spirit of justice is reflected in his highly successful techniques of leadership in the Congress.

The Speaker possesses tremendous power, second only to the President. His power in the House of Representatives is especially great. If he chose to punish a Member who opposed him, he could embarrass and in some instances, defeat the Member by seeing that his pet bills are killed, that he is kept off good committees, that campaign funds are withheld from him.

That is not RAYBURN's way of doing business.

Instead of punishing, RAYBURN simply withholds future favors, bestowing them on those who are his friends. He stands by those who stand by him, but he never seeks vengeance on those who fail to go along.

TALKS WITH FRIENDS

During the working day RAYBURN is always moving, seeing a constant stream of visitors, very sparing of words, relaxed but always busy.

When the working day is over, his greatest diversion is to sit and talk by the hour with trusted friends. The conversation covers the politics of the day, with his reminiscences of the great and near-great thrown in from time to time.

But the conversation always seems to get around to the topics he loves best—his family, his district, the soil, and his faith in the future.

It is impossible to understand RAYBURN without knowing the family stock from which he came. Basically Scottish in ancestry, the Rayburns exhibit many traits associated with the rugged people who defended their religion and their homes in Scotland's mountains for centuries.

At the age of 47, his father packed up a wife and 10 children and left the east Tennessee mountains to start a new life in the black land country of north Texas. Making a living for this big family—soon there were 11 children—from 40 acres of Fannin County land was a continual struggle. Everybody worked and worked hard. They were poor, but they were happy and the family circle was close and warm.

CLOSE KNIT CLAN

Today five of the children are still alive, and they have always been a very close knit clan. They love best to visit with each other.

Once a man asked Bobbie Phillips, who cooked for the Speaker in Bonham for a quarter of a century, which Rayburn owned a certain piece of property.

"I don't know 'bout that," she replied. "I just know what one of 'em has, they all has."

Thriftiness, candor, simple tastes, a fierce love of each other, their friends, the land, and their country—these Scottish traits are common to the entire family.

Washingtonians for nearly half a century have been learning about the Fourth District of Texas and its people, for the topic comes up at almost every gathering where the Speaker is present, whether it be a state dinner or a private conversation in his small apartment.

PRAISES PEOPLE

He likes to tell of the district's sturdy, hard-working, self-reliant, independent people; of their ambitions for good homes, a good name, and oportunity for their children; of its wonderful, deep, black topsoil; of how its soil is being cared for, its rivers dammed, its towns improved, and the rise in its people's well-being in this century.

"My people have shown me a friendship and a devotion unequaled in any annals," he says wistfully.

Asked once what he considered his greatest accomplishments in the Halls of Congress, he quickly replied, "The REA and farm-to-market roads. Those are things that help the real people."

One of RAYBURN's most noticeable traits is his optimism.

He never sighs for "the good old days"; he thinks people today are living better, have better opportunities, are better clothed, housed, fed, and educated than ever before, and he believes that their life will be even better in the years and decades ahead.

STILL HAVE LIBERTIES

It stirs his wrath to hear people say that "we have lost our ancient liberties."

"What liberties have we lost?" he demands. "The American boy and girl today can think what he pleases, say what he pleases, write what he pleases, and can choose his own way of life freely so long as he does not trespass upon someone else.

"We have amended our Federal Constitution 22 times, but today we have every single liberty we had when the Constitution was written in 1787.

"And as long as every citizen holds in his hand a free and unpurchasable ballot—and uses it—we will keep these freedoms."

RAYBURN flares up when he hears people talking about "the bad boys and girls of today."

He just doesn't believe it.

FINEST GENERATION YET

"I think this is the finest generation we have yet produced. They're smarter than the boys and girls of my generation because they have had better training; they are just as patriotic; they are just as clean, and when the burdens of citizenship come to them I know their minds will be keen enough, their shoulders broad enough, and their hearts big enough to preserve, protect, defend, and perpetuate this great democracy," he says over and over again.

"I have great faith in people. I believe that about 98½ percent of the American people have more good in them than bad and, when properly appealed to, they will do the right thing. I have dealt with hundreds of thousands of people in all walks of life, and I have found that when you treat a man right he will nearly always meet you more than halfway," RAYBURN maintains.

RAYBURN's sad, shrewd face, dominated by his deep, dark brown eyes, often wears a stern, almost forbidding look. This leads some who do not know him well to think that he is hard and perhaps fearsome.

KNOWN FOR KINDNESS

In maintaining order in the House of Representatives or in a political convention, he can be stern and very forceful, and he is the exact opposite of the backslapper.

But those who know the man will remember him longest, not for his achievements nor his commonsense, but for his kindness.

A person in trouble, any person, can count on SAM RAYBURN for understanding and help. About the only people he dislikes are those he calls cruel people. The man with a mean tongue or the man who takes advantage of someone less fortunate, these RAYBURN has no use for.

"I think SAM RAYBURN's outstanding characteristic is that he always has time, or takes time, to help anybody who has a problem," Congressman CLARK THOMPSON, of Galveston, once said.

Any human being who has trouble is entitled to sympathy and help, that has been the RAYBURN creed always.

Life magazine some years ago told this true story:

A young newspaper reporter in Washington lost his teenage daughter through illness. Although he had occasionally attended RAYBURN's press conferences, he barely knew the Speaker.

OFFERS HIS HELP

The morning after the daughter died, the father heard the doorbell, and answering it, found SAM RAYBURN there.

"I just came by to see what I could do to help," he said.

Startled, the father said, "I don't think there's anything you can do. We're making all the arrangements."

"Well, have you all had your coffee this morning?" RAYBURN asked.

"No, we haven't had time."

"Well, I can at least make the coffee." And he did.

The reporter said to him, "Mr. Speaker, I thought you were supposed to be having breakfast at the White House this morning."

"Well, I was, but I called the President and told him I had a friend who was in trouble, and I couldn't come."

GIVEN MANY HONORS

Few men in American history have received so many honors or have heard so many compliments from their contemporaries as has SAM RAYBURN.

But perhaps the finest compliment of all came from an unidentified Hunt County farmer in 1943.

Newspaper reporter Clayton Hickerson asked the farmer about RAYBURN.

"There's always some cantankerous talk 'bout politicians," the farmer said, "but I ain't never heard much 'bout Old SAM. He always sees that we're treated right. I guess he always will."

Happy birthday, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THORNBERRY] may extend his remarks at this point in the Record.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. THORNBERRY. Mr. Speaker, we all rejoice that we are given the privilege today to honor our beloved Speaker and wish him a very happy birthday.

Five years ago tonight on the occasion of the traditional birthday party given annually in honor of the Speaker by his close friends, Mr. and Mrs. Dale Miller, of Dallas, Tex., a beautiful song was written and sung by the charming and talented lady, Hank Fort, the composer of numerous songs and folk ballads. Miss Fort is well known throughout the Nation not only because of the beautiful songs and ballads which she has composed but also as a wonderful and attractive entertainer. Miss Fort is from Tennessee, where the Speaker was born.

I know all of us will agree that this wonderful song is one which pays a splendid tribute to the Speaker and is a song that can be sung not only on his birthday, but throughout the year and particularly on the Fourth of July, the birthday of our Nation.

The words to Miss Fort's song are as follows:

HAPPY BIRTHDAY, MISTER SAM

Happy birthday, Mister SAM.
We raise a toast to you.
All throughout the land
We know you stand
For the red, white, and blue.

Happy birthday, Mister SAM,
This is a special day.
'Twas a lucky morn
When you were born.
Cause you're Mister U.S.A.

It's great that we can celebrate,
That we're free to shout and sing,
And we all join in thanking you
For making freedom ring.

Every person great and small,
From Maine to Alabam,
Wants to wish you wealth,
Long life and health;
Happy birthday, Mister SAM.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, few, if any, men have made a greater total impact than Speaker SAM RAYBURN, on the affairs of our Government during this last fateful half century. It is a privilege to join today in the celebration of his 78th birthday. His great influence has been wielded largely through the House of Representatives and his extraordinary leadership in it. No man is more deserving of having his name memorialized for all time in this Capital City and on Capitol Hill.

It would be especially fitting for the House of Representatives and a grateful nation to pay deserved tribute to SAM RAYBURN, devoted patriot and sterling American, by giving his name to the new office building being built on Independence Avenue, to enable the Members of this House to perform their duties and the work of the House more efficiently. Speaker RAYBURN has been largely responsible for the construction of this building, and I have today introduced a House resolution to designate it the Rayburn House Office Building. All who use it in decades to come will be reminded of the very great service rendered to our country and the world by this noble man and dedicated public servant.

Mr. LIBONATI. Mr. Speaker, it is with a deep sense of humility that I approach the intimate subject of your birthday anniversary celebrated today in this House of great living statesmen. Somehow I have a feeling that it would be most sagacious on my part if the subject of age were dispensed with entirely.

Wise men say that the age of a man should be measured by the depths of his intelligence. Alas, the discussion of this facet of the subject would lead me into more delicate numerical determinations—you would not like it.

But may we, who through our experiences in the Congress, reiterate our supreme confidence in your leadership, and further pay homage to your greatness as a patriot and your long dedicated statesmanship to the sacred principles of our Government and its institutions.

We who work with you and accept your leadership thank God that you are among us to guide the Congress of the United States, the future welfare of our Government and its freedom loving citizens. We salute you today to pray for your presence here as Speaker on your next anniversary.

We know that you will continue to serve your Nation in the paths of liberty and justice. Your gavel will protect free institutions against tyrannical and arbitrary legislation. The American people rely upon your leadership too, to guide their destiny. God bless you on this memorable day. May you remain with us forever.

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Speaker, permit me to join with our distinguished majority leader, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK], and others in paying tribute to you and to your distinguished record of service and extending best wishes for a happy birthday on this your birthday anniversary. We of Tennessee are proud of Speaker SAM RAYBURN, we have a great love and affinity for Texas and everything Texan. But, I should like to "correct the record" to make it crystal clear that Speaker RAYBURN is not altogether Texan but is in fact a native of Tennessee—indeed, Speaker RAYBURN is all-American. SAM RAYBURN was born in Roane County in east Tennessee which adjoins the district which I have the honor to represent in the Congress. He has many relatives and friends in my section of Tennessee.

Speaker RAYBURN is honored and respected in my State along with Tennessee's other great sons, Presidents Andrew Jackson, Andrew Johnson, and James K. Polk. Certainly it is appropriate as the new Congress convenes today that we should salute and congratulate Speaker RAYBURN, as he has presided over this House longer than any other man in the history of our country. He is to many of us not only Mr. Speaker, but Mr. Congress, Mr. Democrat, and Mr. American.

So I join with my colleagues in extending congratulations to our beloved Speaker on his birthday and in wishing for him many more happy birthdays and a new decade of service to our country.

SPEAKER RAYBURN STANDS FOR A GOVERNMENT OF LAWS AND NOT OF MEN

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, this is an illustrious occasion. In paying honor to Speaker SAM RAYBURN today, on his 78th birthday, we are honoring a great American. And we are, at the same time, taking a moment to reflect on and pay tribute to the principles and values which have made our country great, because throughout his illustrious career SAM RAYBURN has been a moving force for these principles and values.

I believe that we are honoring today a man who will go down in history as one of the alltime great molders of history. During his long career he has stood as a sentinel of calm wisdom in many hours of crisis for our country. And in the many less spectacular years of history, he has worked in a quiet and never tiring way for our country's progress and well-being.

It would not be possible—certainly not for me—to describe the qualities of leadership. These are qualities which everyone recognizes and no one can define. But some of the things which account for the greatness of SAM RAYBURN I can describe:

He has stood for a government of laws, and not of men.

He has, to a much greater degree than most of us mortals have the capacity to do, been motivated by his country's welfare in all things, without confusing the country's welfare with personal ambitions, personal pride, and other disturbing emotions.

He has stood for integrity.

He has stood for the democratic processes and, as such, has been respectful of minority views.

He has stood most of all for the dignity and the high purpose of the House of Representatives of the United States. In all matters the House of Representatives has come first, and SAM RAYBURN and the high office he holds has come second.

SAM RAYBURN is himself the embodiment of all these things he has stood for so conspicuously and impressed so clearly in the minds and hearts of his countrymen. It is our good luck, and the country's good luck, that he is young and vigorous in both mind and body.

Like other Members of this body who have served for many years with Speaker RAYBURN, I, too, have an individual, deep, and personal affection for him, and I add my heartfelt personal congratulations upon his 78th birthday.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the Texas congressional delegation, our colleague, WALTER ROGERS, has spoken eloquently for the Texas members on this memorable occasion. I wish to join Mr. ROGERS and others here in a word of tribute to our beloved Speaker on this, the anniversary of his birth.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] has been a pillar of strength in the House of Representatives throughout my service here. He has been my friend and inspiration. He has been resolute in his determination to be fair in his leadership. He has won and rewon at each succeeding Congress the admiration and respect and the love of his colleagues on both sides of the aisle.

But the influence of the Speaker has not been circumscribed to the four walls of the House of Representatives. His influence and power have made themselves felt in every corner of the earth. He is not just a statesman of Texas or of the United States; he is a world statesman. His imprint upon the history of our time will linger forever in the annals of our Nation. It has been a great privilege to serve with this good, strong man from Texas. He has borne his honors with a becoming dignity and restraint. The Speaker is not ostentatious; he is simple of manner, modest, forceful, great. Words are such poor vehicles to express our thoughts but it is a heart-warming experience to contemplate the career and character of SAM RAYBURN and to pay tribute to him on his birthday.

I think all Americans would like to join with us today in saying, "Good luck, Mr. Speaker, in the continuation of your great service to America."

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, for more years than many of us have been here birthday greetings have been extended on this date to the Honorable SAM RAYBURN, of Texas. It is my hope that for many more years to come birthday greetings will continue to be extended to him as a great Member of this body. There is little I can say here about him that has not already been said or that is not apparent to each Member of the House.

Yet all of it is worth repeating as a reminder of the greatness of this distinguished American and Texan. Having served longer as Speaker of the House of Representatives of the U.S. Congress than any other man in history, he is recognized as the greatest parliamentarian and is known as the foremost legislative leader throughout the free world.

But there is more to him than this. No one can surpass his devotion to our great Nation. As devoted as he has been to his party, he has in every crisis facing our Nation risen above the political and partisan differences of the moment to fight with courage for the security of our country and the lasting freedom of men, women, and children throughout the world.

He has through his leadership insisted that we here conduct ourselves in a responsible manner, and that we provide a legislative program not only responsive to the needs of the people but also one which will deserve and receive the confidence of all of the people of this Nation.

Mr. RAYBURN with all his association with the great of the world has never lost the common touch nor the simple dignity which has earned for him the affection, admiration and devotion of all of us who have the privilege of being associated with him.

Mr. Speaker, there are three essential qualities for great leadership: foresight, courage, and fairness. Mr. RAYBURN personifies these traits to the utmost degree. He has shown himself to be gentle and strong, wise and understanding. I am sure that I do not exaggerate when I say that in the time I have been in this body there is no one who has come or gone who has held and enjoyed a larger measure of the confidence and the affection of his colleagues than has SAM RAYBURN.

On this day of his birth it is not possible to overlook the great contributions he has made to the stability, strength, and honor of our Government.

I hope that we may have his wise counsel at the policy table of our Government for many years to come.

On behalf of the people of my district, I offer him congratulations and best wishes.

Mr. HECHLER. In the company of legislative giants who have paid tribute to our beloved Speaker, SAM RAYBURN, I feel a little out of place to add my small voice. But while others have lauded him for his outstanding record performance as the presiding officer of the greatest legislative body in the world, I want to say a word or two about the human qualities of this man.

A little over an hour ago, Speaker RAYBURN held a press conference. In the glare of television lights, bombarded by prying questions which covered the waterfront, he talked about the troubles of the world and the affairs of this Nation with great dignity, humor and humility. His outer office was crowded with friends and well-wishers, big and small. Being his birthday, and also the opening day of Congress, it was probably the busiest day of his life.

Yet this statesman found the time to sit down and chat with a freshman Congressman from the Fourth District of West Virginia for 15 or 20 minutes. It was a great honor for me, not alone to have the chance to take so much of his time, but also to exchange ideas with the Speaker and to share in his wisdom on many different subjects. Unhurried, unselfish, giving always of himself, he displayed the great qualities of depth, perspective and a sharp sense of humor and sense of balance which go to make up the great person he is.

So, Mr. Speaker, I salute you and join with the people of the world in saluting you on your 78th birthday.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, your birthday is always a source of inspiration to those of us who have been fortunate enough to serve under your leadership and during your speakerships.

The Rayburn Library at Bonham, Tex., symbolizes for me at least the character of your leadership and contributions to our Nation. In its outward form it is both handsome and obviously long lived and durable, built not to survive the storms of today or yesterday, but the crises and great issues of future years as well. Inwardly, it encompasses the breadth, the richness, as well as the minor items of historical treasures which make up the history of such a vibrant Nation.

Mr. Speaker, you have meant to many of us not only the dignity of one of the greatest public offices in a great democracy, but you signify that to function best this office must be filled in a democracy by a kind, wise, and intensely comprehensive human being.

We shall look forward to the enjoyment of many days in the future, as we do enjoy and appreciate this one, when we are given an opportunity to wish you the happiest of birthdays and the fulfillment of all your desires in the years ahead.

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, every day in every way during these 14 years that I have had the honor and pleasure of being a Member of this legislative body, you have been so fair and just and reasonable and gentlemanly in all of your rulings and in all of your discharge of great responsibilities and heavy loads of official work to me individually, that I feel that in the presence of the eloquent tributes already made by my colleagues to your greatness as our distinguished Speaker that any words I would humbly utter would prove entirely inadequate by comparison.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, on this 78th birthday, to you, whom I feel is the greatest Speaker of the House of Representatives in the history of our beloved Nation, I just say directly, as you sit there in the Speaker's chair, happy birthday and many, many more of them.

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, on this 78th birthday of our distinguished and beloved Speaker, Hon. SAM RAYBURN, of Texas, there is little that any individual can say that has not already been said in glowing terms.

Everyone in this Chamber—and everyone who will read these words—knows that SAM RAYBURN has served for more years as Speaker of the House of Representatives than any Speaker in our history. However impressive that record is of itself, its real significance is that it serves as a testimony to his great character—which is the basis of his constant reelection to the House and to the office of Speaker. Two of the attributes of character essential to his office are integrity and wisdom. SAM RAYBURN personifies these attributes. The confidence freely imposed in him by the membership on both sides of the aisle, as well as by the administration under three Presidents would be jealously withheld from a man who did not possess the integrity with which he is endowed. No one has ever heard of Speaker RAYBURN breaking his word.

As Speaker of the House of Representatives during the trying years of World War II and most of the difficult days since the termination of that conflict Speaker RAYBURN has displayed a wisdom that is unsurpassed in the modern history of the House of Representatives. This coupled with his incomparable leadership has brought about the enactment of laws that are not only necessary and proper but inspired and courageous. This leadership is the manifestation of his unswerving devotion to the Nation and to his party.

I feel privileged to be a part of this body under the speakership of SAM RAYBURN and to be able to join my colleagues in felicitating him and wishing him everything that is good on this anniversary of his birth.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. On behalf of the Wisconsin delegation to this House, and myself, I want to extend to you, Mr. Speaker, our sincere felicitations on the occasion of your birthday.

We are delighted to see you in good health and in such fine spirit, ready to resume the exacting task of presiding over the deliberations of this House.

May the good Lord grant you, Mr. Speaker, many more years of service to your country and your fellow men, and bless you with good health and happiness in this new year and the years ahead.

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that the Florida delegation joins in extending warmest personal regards to you, Mr. Speaker, on the occasion of your birthday. There is much that each of us would like to say on this occasion to convey to you our genuine personal regard and our great appreciation for your good works. Yet, so much already has been said by so many who are far more gifted in phraseology that it is difficult to find words to convey the sense of meaning which is felt.

Few men in public life have been as greatly beloved as you. Few men have enjoyed such distinction of outstanding leadership. None have surpassed your record of accomplishments. The combination of these unusual and outstanding achievements is one which is truly unique and found only in the person of our own beloved SAM RAYBURN.

The Nation has been favored indeed in having benefited through these many years from the experience, the wisdom, and the leadership of our Speaker. His warm and pleasant personal guidance has been invaluable to every Member, young and old alike, who has availed himself of the Speaker's counsel, and all of us have done this. It is a great privilege to see a man mature into a living legend during his own lifetime a truly great and outstanding American. That, Mr. Speaker, is the position you occupy in the minds and hearts of your colleagues and of the people throughout the world.

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say to the majority leader what a privilege it is to participate in this grand event this afternoon. It has been my pleasure to serve with Mr. RAYBURN for better than 17 years and I want to say what a glorious privilege it is to be here and to congratulate our great leader on his birthday.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I have served with Mr. SAM for a period of over 37 years and during that period I have come to know the manner of man he is, his integrity, his unfailing leadership, his acute sensitivity to justice.

Mr. SAM has served in this Chamber in war and in peace; he has served in periods of adversity and periods of prosperity. Throughout his service, he has stood as firm as a rock and surmounted all difficulties. He has an enduring faith—in his country, his party, and in his fellow men. We all applaud his loyalty to his friends and his fairness to his foes. He wields the gavel of his office with objectivity and temperance. No one can deny his great influence upon the membership and the impress of his personality and character upon the major issues of our time. Formerly, as chairman of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, he nurtured bills of major significance that are now law and which bear his honored name, a name which is known and respected through the world.

We are all happier here because of his presence amongst us. It is indeed a privilege to salute Mr. SAM on his birthday.

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, on this, your birthday, here in this Chamber a great many words are being spoken, by Members of both parties, in your honor and in praise of your long period of distinguished service in the House of Representatives. It is only natural that we who have been fortunate enough to serve in the Congress, under your leadership, and who have benefited and profited by your help, guidance, and assistance, should love you and respect you.

Our Speaker, however, wins hearts wherever he goes. On December 12 we were highly honored when you paid us a visit in Cedar Rapids, Iowa. I would like to insert into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a letter to the editor which appeared in the Cedar Rapids Gazette on December 19. This letter was written by one of the people who attended the banquet at which you spoke. I think this letter mirrors a noble character—the kind of man our beloved Speaker is.

The letter follows:

[From the Cedar Rapids (Iowa) Gazette, December 19, 1959]

SAM RAYBURN TALKED PRINCIPLES

To the EDITOR: On December 12 Linn County and the city of Cedar Rapids were highly honored by the presence of one of the greatest living statesmen of these United States—the Honorable SAM RAYBURN, Speaker of the House of Representatives. Mr. RAYBURN has served the United States in Congress for 46 years. In Cedar Rapids he was the principal speaker at a fund-raising dinner for the Democratic Party. His speech was very broad and full of American principles—to anyone who is broadminded and has principles. He told how hard our forefathers worked, with far-reaching vision, to write the Constitution that has stood the tests of time, and serves the country today just as it did the Thirteen Colonies. Through all these years with their many changes, the Constitution has needed only 19 amendments, one of which has been repealed.

He talked about the youth of America and how they must be trained to take over and carry on and uphold the American heritage after we are gone.

He talked about an America so unified, brotherly, and happy that there would be no North and South or East and West.

He spoke about the ups and downs he has seen in this Nation since he first went to Washington, blaming the Republican administration for some of them and quoting statistics to support his viewpoint.

He reminded his fellow citizens that where there is need, there is opportunity; and where there is privilege, there is duty.

He told how the senior Congressmen help the Members who are newly elected to Congress. He told how so many Congressmen's wives help their husbands through thick and thin, and what a wonderful institution marriage is when its obligations are fulfilled.

On the whole, Mr. RAYBURN'S speech was almost nonpolitical; it was a speech of American principles and morals. With very little revision the same speech could very appropriately be delivered to a gathering of Masons, Knights of Columbus, parent-teacher association, chamber of commerce, or any other organization.

I am very glad that I attended the banquet and heard Mr. RAYBURN'S speech and saw him deliver it. I am very proud to be able to say I shook hands with Mr. RAYBURN.

Every citizen owes a debt of gratitude to Mr. RAYBURN or any other statesman who has served this Nation so many years. Let us be respectful to our senior statesmen, whether they are of this political party or that. This United States of America, in order to uphold democracy, must have more than one political party. Let's give credit where credit is due.

E. A. COULTAS.

MOUNT VERNON.

THE LATE CHARLES A. BOYLE

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. O'BRIEN].

Mr. O'BRIEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the death of our colleague, the late CHARLES A. BOYLE, a member of the Illinois delegation, under tragic circumstances in Chicago during the recess, fills our hearts with sadness.

He distinguished himself as a lawyer and a legislator, by his aggressiveness and willingness to work for the minorities and the oppressed. His activities in private life were a succession of accomplishments for those from whom he could expect no reward. His generosity was boundless and his desire to serve his fellow man is recorded in the minds of those he benefited.

CHARLIE BOYLE will be remembered when many of us, occupied with our own concern, have been forgotten, for he never feared to work for an unpopular cause, when in his own conscience he knew it as a just cause. He championed the oppressed, the downtrodden, and the outraged. His efforts at righting wrongs done to men in the service of their country are recorded. His unselfish devotion to the things he believed to be duty will serve better as a monument to his integrity than anything we can say here.

Congressman BOYLE early in life faced obstacles and triumphed over them. His difficulties in gaining an education for the profession of his choice challenge the imagination. His was a spirit that brooked no thought of compromise. Honors came to him and he wore them lightly.

I recall the efforts and long hours that CHARLIE BOYLE expended to become what we know as a good Congressman. He began doing that during his freshmen term, and he never stopped. He worked diligently and conscientiously on all legislation before his committee, and in doing so made a contribution to every committee assignment he ever held. He never lost his objective viewpoint nor ceased to work hard and effectively.

We pay our deep respect to a tireless worker, a delightful character, and above all to a family man whose heart was filled with gratitude for the blessings which were his. His widow and his children have our deepest sympathy for they have suffered an irreparable loss.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'BRIEN of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. YATES].

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, the ways of the Lord are inscrutable and not open to question. We must accept, therefore, the sad fate which befell our beloved colleague, Congressman CHARLES A. BOYLE, last November, when death claimed him suddenly. All of us were stunned and saddened when we learned of his untimely passing.

CHARLIE BOYLE was a most unusual personality. Traveling as he did in the world of political affairs filled with distinguished men who possessed great charm and friendliness, CHARLIE BOYLE nevertheless stood out as one who owned these fine qualities to a singular degree. His geniality, his warmth, his spirit filled the atmosphere whenever he entered a room.

He was helpful. There was not anything he would not do for any of his colleagues. There was not anything he would not do for his constituents. There was not anything he would not do to be helpful to his fellow men. Never has the 12th Congressional District, which is the neighboring district to mine, been so ably represented as it was by CHARLIE BOYLE. It had never been represented by a member of our party prior to his election in 1954.

So quickly did he gain the confidence of his constituents that even with the history of the district as going toward the opposite party, he was elected and reelected. His constituents knew his talents. They knew his qualities. They knew that here was a man who served them in the way in which they wanted to be served.

One can only think, with the passing of CHARLIE BOYLE, of the poem by the great poet who wrote several centuries ago, John Donne, when he said:

No man is an Island, Intire of itself;
Every man is a peece of the continent,
A part of the maine;
If a clod bee washed away by the Sea, Europe is the lessee,
As well as if a promontory were,
As well as if a mannor of thy friends or of thine owne were;
Any man's death diminishes me,
Because I am involved in mankinde;
And therefore do not send to know for whom the bell tolls;
It tolls for thee.

To Mrs. Boyle, to her wonderful family I want to express the sympathy of Mrs. Yates and myself upon their irreparable loss of a wonderful husband and father.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'BRIEN of Illinois. I yield to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, the news of the death of our friend and colleague, CHARLIE BOYLE, came as a great shock, first because he was a personal friend and secondly, because as a member of the Committee on Appropriations he had rendered invaluable service to the committee, to the House, and to the country.

He was an unusual man. He had been selected a year or two ago as the ideal father in America. And his family life carried out every implication involved in that unusual designation.

He was especially valuable as a member of the Committee on Appropriations. He was not only a man of mature judgment, and wide business experience but he was a man of exceptional judgment. He could always be depended upon when we needed sound counsel and advice to bring to us a practical solution of some of the most difficult problems that confronted the committee. The country has lost a great legislator.

I wish to join my friend from Illinois who has just spoken, in tendering to Mrs. Boyle and the children our deepest sympathy.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'BRIEN of Illinois. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAHON].

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I did not know the late CHARLIE BOYLE very well until he became a member of the Subcommittee on Defense Appropriations. During his service as a member of the Defense Subcommittee I sat with him through the weeks and months of hearings and I became familiar with his brilliant mind and his warm and understanding heart. He was a stalwart friend of defense. I shall never forget his helpfulness in our important work.

CHARLIE BOYLE was a truly great man, a fine legislator, a man who loved his country, who loved his colleagues, and a man who loved his family. We have sustained a great and irreparable loss in the passing of this fine American.

I join my friend from Illinois and others in paying tribute to his memory and expressing words of sympathy to the dear ones he left behind.

Mr. O'BRIEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KLUCZYNSKI].

Mr. KLUCZYNSKI. Mr. Speaker, on the morning of the fifth day of November 1959, following the judicial election in the city of Chicago, I turned on the radio in my home and was shocked to learn that my colleague, the Honorable CHARLES A. BOYLE, was fatally injured in an automobile accident the night before.

CHARLIE BOYLE graduated from Mount Carmel High School in Chicago in 1925, from Loyola University in 1930, and from Loyola Law School in 1933. He was admitted to practice law in Illinois and was a member of the Chicago, Illinois, and American Bar Associations. To obtain his education he worked in various positions. He was a speaker of note and was the winner of several oratorical contests. He was selected as the Chicagoland Father of the Year in 1952–53 and later was chosen as Mr. Illinois. He was a member of the House Committee on Appropriations and on the Subcommittee on Defense.

Our friend CHARLIE BOYLE was a man of great ability. He was always sincere and forthright. His integrity was such that his word was as good as his bond. We admired him for these sterling qualities; but, more than that, we loved CHARLIE BOYLE because of his great capacity for friendship. He was always kindly, congenial, and helpful. He radiated optimism. His very presence in a room brightened it. It was a joy to be in his presence.

In Congressman CHARLIE BOYLE's death, his State and his country have lost an outstanding public servant and a great statesman. We, his colleagues who knew and loved him, have lost one of our dearest friends.

I am saddened by his death and offer my deepest sympathy to his gracious wife, Helen, and the other members of the wonderful family he has left behind. It is my hope and prayer that they may find some measure of consolation in the fact that a devoted husband and father lived a full and rich life, a life dedicated to the service of his fellow men.

Mr. O'BRIEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LANE].

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, as the roll was called we noted the absence of a dear friend, Representative CHARLES A. BOYLE, of the 12th Illinois District. It is always difficult to resign ourselves to the death of those who were close to us, but sorrow is harder to bear when they are taken from us in the full vigor of their lives.

CHARLIE BOYLE was a young man, rich with ideas that he wanted to incorporate into legislation for the benefit of his constituents and for the Nation.

His keen mind and eloquent voice served his country well. The Appropriations Committee and the Subcommittee on Defense will miss his understanding of the challenge facing our country and how that challenge must be met. His big and generous heart was matched by his faith in freedom. He knew that we cannot mark time. Our economy must ever expand in order to make our Nation strong, and to help other peoples to travel with us along the road of human progress.

Congressman BOYLE was a devoted husband and father, and his deeply religious spirit was expressed every day of his life by respect and consideration for his fellow man.

To his large family we extend our sincere sympathy. We want them to know that their fond memories of a father who gave them a name to be proud of, are shared by those of us who were privileged to serve with him in the U.S. House of Representatives.

In every way he earned the reward of eternal happiness.

Mr. O'BRIEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARENDS].

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, grievous at heart, I join with the rest of my colleagues in the House of Representatives, particularly those of us from Illinois, in expressing our great sorrow with the passing of our Illinois Member of Congress, which came about so unexpectedly and was so untimely. Although I may not have known CHARLES BOYLE as well as some other Members of the House, I did know him well enough to become affectionately acquainted with him. I knew him as a man of upright character, one of the friendliest individuals I have ever known in my whole life. It seems he was one individual who enjoyed the good things of life and he wanted others also to share in all good things. One thing about CHARLES BOYLE I must mention, in my many conversations with him, was that never once did I talk with him but that somewhere and sometime during the conversation he would bring up a question about his wonderful family. He was a devoted family man. He was proud of his homelife, his wife and his wonderful children. It always impressed me, knowing that only a man who so loved his family could really and truly be a great man. So along with those of us today who mourn his loss, I say to his fine family, may God give you comfort in the loss you have suffered.

Mr. O'BRIEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MURPHY].

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to join my colleagues in paying our respects to the late CHARLES A. BOYLE.

I have known Mr. BOYLE intimately for a great number of years. We were associated in the practice of law, politically and socially. Mr. BOYLE's son graduated last year with my son from Loyola Academy in the city of Chicago.

It was a great shock to me and my family when we learned of Mr. BOYLE's death because I had spent several hours with him the previous day.

The people of the 12th Congressional District in Illinois have lost a truly great Representative and we of the 86th Congress a truly great friend.

My family and I extend our heartfelt sympathy to Mrs. Boyle and her family in their bereavement.

Mr. O'BRIEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROONEY].

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, it was indeed a great shock to read in the morning papers of November 5 last of the tragic passing of my good friend and distinguished colleague, Representative CHARLES A. BOYLE, of the 12th Congressional District of Illinois. At the time he was a man still in the full vigor of his life and his fatal accident left me dumbfounded.

CHARLIE BOYLE came to the Congress in 1954 as the first Democrat ever elected to the House from the 12th District of Illinois. We served together as members of the House Committee on Appropriations as the result of which I had a very high regard for his ability and intelligence as a sound legislator. It was my privilege to have enjoyed a close and warm friendship with CHARLIE and I realize that I have lost a good and true friend.

CHARLIE BOYLE was an exemplary family man leaving a lovely wife and eight fine children. In 1952 he was named Chicagoland Father of the Year.

CHARLIE BOYLE will be sadly missed in this House of Representatives and by the people of his district, the State of Illinois, and the Nation. I shall always think of him with fond memories, and express my profound sympathy to his dear wife and his children.

Mr. O'BRIEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PUCINSKI].

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, it is with a heavy heart that I rise today to join my colleagues in eulogizing one of the great Members of Congress, the late Honorable CHARLES AUGUSTUS BOYLE, who for the past 5 years has so diligently represented the 12th Congressional District of Illinois.

Mr. BOYLE'S death on November 4, 1959, was as much a loss to the entire Nation as it was to the people of the 12th District, who loved and supported him in his courageous stand toward solving the many problems which confront a republic.

Many of my colleagues will recall how Congressman BOYLE made the motion last September to adjourn the 1st session of the 86th Congress. This was the fifth time that Mr. BOYLE had been selected by his colleagues to conclude the deliberations of Congress, and it reflects the high regard that all of us, on both sides of the aisle in this astute body, had for our distinguished colleague.

The House of Representatives has had many distinguished Members who have made an indelible mark on the course of history. To this group we can all proudly add Congressman BOYLE'S name, for while he had come from a humble background, Mr. BOYLE'S uncompromising attitude toward fairplay and justice has made him a pillar of our democracy.

In his brief career as a Member of Congress, Mr. BOYLE had won the respect of both Democrats and Republicans because he was always in the forefront wherever the traditional liberties of our Nation were challenged. His determined defense of the rights of all American citizens, regardless of race, creed, or color, was an inspiration to all of us. His ability to present his views and support them with indisputable facts in defense of justice shall long be remembered by those who have had the honor of working with him.

Mr. BOYLE was the first Democratic Congressman ever to be elected from the 12th District of Illinois, when in 1954 he was elected to the 84th Congress. Because of his dedication to the principles of good government, he was reelected to the 85th and 86th Congresses. Perhaps the greatest measure of the esteem and admiration in which he was held by his constituents was documented when Mr. BOYLE was reelected in 1956, despite the Republican landslide of that year.

Mr. BOYLE'S rise to prominence indeed reflects the full glory of a democracy, which does not judge a man by his background, but rather by his ability.

Mr. BOYLE was born on August 13, 1907, on a farm near Spring Lake, Mich. After leaving the farm, he sold newspapers and worked his way through college and law school as a conductor, a checker, an investigator, a driver, and finally as an inspector for the Chicago Motor Coach Co. Despite the tremendous demand on his time in trying to earn a livelihood, Mr. BOYLE managed to attend Loyola University and Loyola Law School during the evening hours and won his law degree in 1933.

Mr. BOYLE never forgot the plight of the individual American, and because of this deep respect for the rights of the individual, he wrote a distinguished record as a member of the House Judiciary Committee and the Committee on Appropriations.

In 1955, Congressman BOYLE was sent to Tokyo, Japan, to investigate and report on status of forces agreements and act as congressional observer in the trial of GI's at Maebashi. It was his duty to help make postwar Japan more cognizant of the full concept of jurisprudence and the preservation of individual rights in a nation steeped in its own traditions.

Mr. BOYLE'S wide interests made him a specialist in housing, and in 1937 and 1938 he was appointed zone attorney for 12 States in the Federal Housing Administration. He helped draft much of the legislation, including the rules and regulations for the FHA.

It is with deep conviction that I say here today that Mr. BOYLE'S loss will be felt by the entire Nation, for here was a man who possessed not only great personal ability and dedication to the concept of freedom, but he was also a man with a tremendous heart.

To his wife and eight children we today extend our deepest sympathy. May he rest in peace.

Mr. O'BRIEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. EDMONDSON].

Mr. EDMONDSON. Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues in extending sympathy to the family of our distinguished colleague, CHARLIE BOYLE. He was a warm, sympathetic, and friendly man; one beloved by all. When the beloved dean of the Illinois delegation spoke of a man's willingness to fight for the oppressed, he certainly described CHARLIE BOYLE.

I remember in 1955 a constituent of his became embroiled in some difficulty in Tokyo as a member of the Armed Forces. CHARLIE BOYLE not only came to his assistance, but at great personal sacrifice traveled across the country to catch a plane and go to the Far East, and interceded personally in Japan in behalf of this boy who was in trouble with Japanese authorities while a member of the Armed Forces overseas. Very few men would go so far out of their way and go to such personal sacrifice as CHARLIE BOYLE did to help a young man. That speaks more eloquently than any words could speak of his willingness and readiness to be helpful to his fellow man in distress or in need or undergoing oppression of any kind.

I am proud of the friendship I had with this fine American and able legislator.

I join with my colleagues in deploring his loss to the Nation.

Mr. O'BRIEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I did not know CHARLIE BOYLE very well until he came on the Appropriations Committee. I was impressed from the start with the fact that he was able to command the great problems that we had confronting us and that many of us perhaps find exceedingly difficult. He was a man of real ability and great force. The country will be worse off because he is gone, but it can also be helped by the fact that we did have amongst us a man of that character.

Mr. O'BRIEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. ALBERT].

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I join the distinguished dean of the Illinois delegation in this fine tribute to CHARLIE BOYLE. Word of his untimely death came as a shock to me.

CHARLIE was an energetic, enthusiastic, courageous Member of this House. He had great devotion to duty. He was friend of the little man, a defender of justice at all times. He was my friend, and I shall miss him.

CHARLIE left a wonderful family. It was always inspiring to see him with his children. To them and to Mrs. Boyle I extend my heartfelt sympathy.

Mr. O'BRIEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. REUSS].

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to add what I have to say to the many fine expressions made here this afternoon by those who loved the late CHARLIE BOYLE.

Much has been said of his friendliness, his wisdom, his industry. But what I was impressed with more than any other of his many fine qualities was his deep belief in justice. He truly foresaw, in his maiden speech here on March 16, 1955, that any steps that we were going to make toward world peace had of necessity to be founded upon justice. I recall the thrill with which I heard him make that speech in this House. Among other things he said:

Mr. Speaker, I am happy to be a Member of this House, and I am very happy to be a member of that group who once again asks you and pleads with you to try to do everything possible in both an economic and in a political sense in the interest of peace. We admit we are doing almost everything we can, in a military sense. In our dealings with all nations, it will mean that we must have the modesty to admit that our own national interest is all that we are really capable of knowing and understanding, and the courage to recognize that if our purposes and undertakings here at home are decent ones, unsullied by arrogance or hostility toward other people or delusions of superiority, then the pursuit of our national interest can never fail to be conducive to a better world. Then, by our own conduct, we will be telling the sad and the lonely of the world of the love that is theirs to be, and by the cross of Christ and His passion and the might that is born in brotherhood and unity we will be showing the world that we are doing more than merely paying lipservice to an empty ideal—that we are, in fact, trying to live in the community of nations under God.

I agree with him, and with the words spoken shortly after by his colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. O'HARA], that we had just heard the delivery of one of the great maiden speeches in the history of the House.

This search after justice by CHARLIE BOYLE was displayed in small things as in great. I remember one afternoon when we were all over at Griffith Stadium watching the Senators play a baseball game. The officers in the stadium that afternoon had been very lenient. A number of foul balls hit into the upper tiers had been grabbed as souvenirs by those who were watching the ball game—without any questions being raised. Then, late in the game, another foul ball was knocked up into the upper tiers. It was caught by a little, slight fellow, poorly dressed, someone who was obviously meager in his share of this world's goods. At that point, the official policy seemed to change; the officer came around and demanded the ball, and pocketed it. Although we were sitting some rows away, I thought the slight little man was going to cry, and while I and the others were sitting there, trying to bring this little tragedy into focus, and to decide what if anything could be done, CHARLIE BOYLE, who was sitting next to us, moving with great speed, went forward and went up to the officer. I could see that a heated argument was in progress. Then, suddenly, the officer, with a sheepish smile, gave the baseball to the slight little man. He burst into a great and wonderful smile.

Now, if CHARLIE BOYLE is to be criticized for throwing his weight around, if he did not sufficiently observe the fine line which should be drawn between the functions of the executive and the legislative, I am sure that the Lord will forgive him. So shines a good deed in a naughty world.

His lovely wife, Helen, has lost a loyal husband; his wonderful children have lost a devoted father; and those of us here who loved him have lost a friend who never can be replaced.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Speaker, it is with a heavy heart that I rise this afternoon to join my beloved dean and other colleagues in the House of Representatives in paying tribute to the late Honorable CHARLES A. BOYLE.

CHARLIE BOYLE and I came to the Congress in the same year and from the first time I shook his hand he was a tower of personal strength to me. He always had a smile and a good word for all.

I think of the words here this afternoon: "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends."

I think that describes CHARLIE BOYLE more eloquently than any words I might utter here today.

To his charming wife and eight children I join the others in expressing very sincere sympathy in the loss of a great father and husband, a great legislator, and a great American.

Mr. O'BRIEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. GEORGE P. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I want to join with the others in expressing my sincere and deep appreciation for the great work and qualities of our late colleague, CHARLES BOYLE, of Illinois.

It was my privilege to know him and to work with him. The things that have been said here today about him are true and they reflect the esteem in which he was held by his colleagues in the House of Representatives.

Mr. BOYLE was a Christian gentleman; he practiced the philosophy of the dignity of man.

We are the losers at his passing. I express my sympathy to his wife and lovely family.

Mr. O'BRIEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL].

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, it was my happiness to know intimately the late CHARLES BOYLE. During the past summer here when our families had gone home, he along with some other Congressmen—and I was privileged to be in the group—used to go swimming at one of the clubs here. Often we had dinner together.

I found Mr. BOYLE to be a fine friend. He was a man of dedication, he was sincere, he was a person who exemplified the best in family relationships.

I found it was a great privilege to know CHARLES BOYLE and to have his friendship and along with other Members who have spoken here, I extend my deepest sympathy to his wife and to his family.

Mr. O'BRIEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VANIK].

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Speaker, it was with profound sorrow that I learned of the fatal automobile accident which took the life of my good friend, CHARLIE BOYLE, on election night last November.

I join with my colleagues from Illinois in paying tribute to Congressman CHARLES A. BOYLE of the 12th District of Illinois. His constituents and the Nation have lost a true and fearless advocate, a dedicated servant. His widow and family of eight wonderful children have lost a devoted husband and father. I have lost a dear friend.

I have known Congressman BOYLE and his family as friends and neighbors since we came to Congress together. It was my privilege to see the Boyle family in their happiest and most treasured moments—when the children would romp and play and sing with their dad. They were a close-knit, devoted family team.

Congressman CHARLES A. BOYLE was a man of many interests. Foremost, however, was his love of home and love of family. In 1952 he was elected Chicagoland Father of the Year and later chosen "Mr. Illinois." Although a prominent Catholic layman, CHARLIE was recently accorded honorary membership in a Jewish synagogue in his district. Such was the measure of this man.

In his work in Congress, CHARLIE BOYLE was dedicated and untiring on every issue. His words and his vote were always recorded on the side of the humanity which he loved.

I know the courageous spirit which dwells in his widow, Helen Boyle, and the family strength which will empower her and the children to successfully make their way ahead.

Mr. O'BRIEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HAYS].

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, I join and concur in everything that my colleagues have said about the statesmanship of the late Congressman BOYLE and about his high type of service here in the House. But, as much as we will miss him, I think he will be missed far more by his family, his wife and his eight children, because it has been my privilege to see a lot of devoted and doting fathers in my time, but never one who so constantly had his family in mind as CHARLIE BOYLE did. Therefore, I wish to especially express my sympathy to his wife and to his children, who will miss him greatly in the years to come.

Mr. O'BRIEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANTANGELO].

Mr. SANTANGELO. Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleagues in paying tribute to CHARLIE BOYLE. On November 4, 1959, while driving alone, a tragic automobile accident took CHARLIE away from us in this Chamber.

Mr. Speaker, I shall always remember his kindness, his friendship, and his automobile. I personally shall miss him very much.

Washington, D.C., can be a cold town, especially to a newcomer. When I first arrived in Washington this town was cold and the evenings were somewhat lonesome. The first warm feeling I received here was after the President's ball in 1957 when CHARLIE took me and my wife to pile in his old jalopy with four other congressional couples. Dressed in tails and evening gowns, we made the town and had a wonderful evening. We enjoyed a cup of hot coffee, while dressed in tails, at the White Tower. This was the first pleasant evening I spent in this town, and I owe it to CHARLIE BOYLE. He showed me that Washington had a heart and that Congress had men of intelligence, warmth, and understanding. Putting 10 people in his car made CHARLIE feel young and very happy. It made him feel as if he were at home with his eight children driving around the country with him. At breakfast or in the cloakroom, when we breakfasted together, which was very often, or when we shared a cup of coffee together, he would frequently talk about his lovely wife, Helen, and his eight children. He often talked about the problem of raising a large family and how difficult it was. He was a loving husband and a devoted father.

Representative BOYLE's prematurely ended career was a classic American success story. Born on a farm in Michigan, CHARLES BOYLE worked his way through college and law school by driving a Chicago city bus for 7 years. After his admission to the bar he practiced law in Chicago. During the late thirties he served as zone attorney and agent for the Federal Housing Administration. His experience on the farm and his life in the city caused him to understand the problems of the farmer and the aspirations of the city cliffdwellers.

As a proven champion of the underdog and orator of note, CHARLES BOYLE was inevitably drawn to a political career. He was elected to the 84th Congress and reelected to the two succeeding Congresses. His record here in Washington was outstanding. Representative BOYLE's character was recognized by his people. His fellow Chicagoans named him "Chicagoland Father of the Year" in 1952. I was fortunate to serve with him on the Committee on Appropriations, and I can attest that he was an excellent legislator and a splendid American.

CHARLES BOYLE passed this way and has gone to the great beyond. Because on the way he touched me, I am richer in experience, wiser in judgment. I am happier in memories. All who met him on his journey through the corridor called life share this feeling and sentiment.

To his wife, Helen, and his children, I extend my heartfelt sympathy.

Mr. O'BRIEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. O'HARA].

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, another chapter in Americana has closed. CHARLIE BOYLE represented and lived by the true American tradition. There was no silver spoon in his mouth when he was born, but in his heart was golden treasure and as he grew into childhood the ambition budded to prepare himself for an adult life of service to humanity. Everything that he was to get in this world he had to earn for himself. To take him through college he drove a taxi. He did anything that he could honestly to earn his way and to prepare himself for his destiny.

Mr. Speaker, I think that every man does have a destiny, his mission to perform. CHARLIE BOYLE had his destiny. I always thought that he had a sense of realizing the nature of his destiny. His acts of friendship in this House, his every word and every deed, pinpointed his realization that his was a destiny of service to humanity. Everybody was his friend and CHARLIE BOYLE never failed a friend. In Chicago everywhere they spoke of him, and in the grief that now prevails still speak of him, as warmhearted CHARLIE BOYLE. His heart was as tender as his voice was eloquent, and his brain sharp and keen.

At the close of the last session I stood chatting with him out behind the rail near the coffeeroom. I said, "CHARLIE, you are 52; you are young; you have made a great record in the House; you have served unselfishly and outstandingly your constituents and your country; you have a great future ahead of you. You have an ability that I have never known in any other man to the degree that you possess it—the ability of memory. You are in the prime of life, your national stature already brilliantly established, and your future can lead to any heights."

Once I had introduced a young man to CHARLIE BOYLE. CHARLIE had not seen this young man for 2 years, had had no contact with him, no especial reason for remembering him, yet when again he met him he called him by his first name, "Fred, how are you?" He possessed one of the most unfailing memories for names I have ever known.

He went everywhere. He met people. Such a man in the political world, with his ability, with his dedication—of course, there was a future for him. So I was saying to CHARLIE right out there in this Chamber behind the rail that he had a great future in public life. He said, "No, BARRATT, I do not feel that way." We then talked of the sacrifices men in Congress are called upon to make, sacrifices willingly made and unadvertised, but the toll they take from families. No man ever loved his wife and children more than CHARLIE BOYLE.

I do not know that he had a sense of what was going to happen to him, but I remember that little chat so well, right out there in this Chamber behind the rail, and it came vividly to mind that morning in November when I had turned on the radio to hear the dreadful tidings of his death.

Mr. Speaker, this is another one of those occasions when we realize the inadequacy of words. All of us loved CHARLIE BOYLE, and we have been in this well trying to project something of our feeling, something of our sentiment, something of our grief. But words are inadequate. We feel so deeply within us that there are no words that can measure the volume of our grief.

To that fine wife and to those eight wonderful children I extend my most profound sympathy.

At his funeral, joining our beloved dean, TOM O'BRIEN, and CHARLIE's colleagues from Illinois were HENRY REUSS and CHARLIE VANIK, close friends of the Boyle family. I shall never forget that scene. HENRY and CHARLIE standing among the children, their arms stretched out to embrace them all together, and all weeping. This is how we felt. Warmhearted CHARLIE BOYLE had left us, in the midday of his sojourn; another chapter in Americana had been closed. He had fulfilled his destiny of service to humanity.

Mr. AVERY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'BRIEN of Illinois. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. AVERY. Mr. Speaker, I should like to join my friends in paying tribute to our former colleague, the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. BOYLE. As Members present today probably know, Mr. BOYLE's philosophy of government and my own were about as far removed as two philosophies could possibly be. But despite that we were very good friends.

It was our privilege to be elected to the Congress in the same year, 1954, and because our wives were both members of the 84th Club, through that association we had considerable social contact with Mr. BOYLE, and it was through that particular medium that I became well acquainted with him.

So many things about Mr. BOYLE impressed me. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. O'HARA] mentioned that he had eight children. Notwithstanding his own family I was impressed with the generosity of Mr. BOYLE's character, by the fact in addition to their own children, they found room in their home and heart for another child. I know of few Members of the House who would have undertaken additional responsibility under similiar circumstances. Any person who is willing to make a place for another child in his own home certainly has manifested his true interest and dedication to his fellow men more than in any other way it could possibly be expressed. I think it was characteristic of Mr. BOYLE's sympathetic nature, his true love of his fellow men, and his dedication to his own responsibility as a father, a citizen, and as a Member of the House of Representatives.

Again may I say, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. BOYLE will certainly be missed by all of his colleagues who serve the Congress. We extend our condolences to his wife and his children.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, the tragic death on November 4, 1959, of our late colleague and my personal friend, CHARLES A. BOYLE, was a shock to me, as well as to my colleagues.

During his service in this body, CHARLIE BOYLE and I became close friends. He was one of the most serious and industrious Members of this body. His ability was outstanding. Those in this body who served with him will long treasure his memory.

CHARLES BOYLE, at 52, was at the peak of his intellectual vigor, and, in his third term in Congress, had achieved the facility of a veteran legislator. In his congressional service, he made full use of the experience gained in his student days, when, while earning his law degrees, he drove a bus and served in other capacities the Chicago Motor Coach Co. His experience as zone attorney for the Federal Housing Administration, supervising 12 Midwestern States, qualified him to speak as an authority on many matters connected with housing. CHARLIE BOYLE made a name for himself by his eloquence at an early age, winning the Chicago high school oratorial championship in 1924, and in 1930 both winning the Carter Harrison oratorical medal at Loyola University and placing second in the national intercollegiate regional oratorical tournament. Through his legal and legislative career, he had practiced and developed this speaking ability to a high point of excellence.

In his personal relationships CHARLES BOYLE was also notably successful. As devoted husband, and father of eight children, he won recognition in 1952 as "Chicagoland Father of the Year" and "Mr. Illinois." He was a man of many warm friendships, genial, and deeply concerned for the welfare of his neighbors. An American of Irish descent, a communicant of the Catholic church, a man of deep faith, he was always found fighting the battle of the sick, the weak, the oppressed, the persecuted. He opposed and fought bigotry in any form. By word, example, and deed, he lived up to the spiritual truths he so strongly believed in.

He was a strong supporter of newly established nations, and new nations emerging from colonization. For example, he was one of the strongest champions of the recently established nation of Israel. His name will long live in a memorial established by Israel in his honor in 1957, on his 50th birthday—a grove of 1,000 eucalyptus trees near the hills of Judea.

To Mrs. Boyle and her loved ones, his friends and colleagues offer our tribute of honor to his memory, and of sorrow in the passing on of CHARLIE BOYLE.

Mr. O'BRIEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may be permitted to extend their remarks at this point in the RECORD regarding the life and services of the late CHARLES A. BOYLE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. LIBONATI. Mr. Speaker, God's strength of will foredooms men to the hereafter. And so it was with our distinguished colleague, CHARLES A. BOYLE, of Illinois, whose recent tragic death was bemoaned by his friends, associates, and family.

Throughtout his entire life he chose to serve those who needed most the succor and strength of honest and true leadership in public affairs. He never faltered in his support of liberal doctrines for the protection of the natural freedoms of the oppressed. And with that oratorical brilliancy characteristic of the sages of other years of these Capitol Halls, he forcibly and with pointed language carried the debate to the success it merited.

It is a common fault of most men in political life to stretch their finances beyond their own worldly gains. And so it was with CHARLES BOYLE whose many kindnesses won for him many blessings of the poor and unfortunate.

His youth and early adult life was one of great struggle and sacrifice. He worked his way at various trades, some menial, others skilled, to reach the heights of the legal profession.

As a father he was a worthy example of the true American parent. His heartfelt devotion to his family was a byword among his neighbors.

His love of his eight children is reflected in the many sacrifices that he endured providing for their education and welfare.

He was a Catholic person who lived by his religious precepts. He was happy most in a political scrap—and the Lord knows that he was an expert in a slambang campaign. He was in the forefront in Israel's fight for recognition and freedom. Among these people of religious faith he was admired and supported in all of his undertakings and campaigns. He believed in what he stood for. His was not the stand of a political bigot whose personal opinion betrayed his public position on questions. CHARLES BOYLE was an alert and devoted, dedicated statesman. He was a stanch and loyal friend. Who could ask for more? The people of the Nation, the State of Illinois, and the citizens of Chicago have lost a statesman of great character and national stature in the death of our popular colleague, CHARLES A. BOYLE.

May God bless his familly and dutiful and loving wife, Helen, who with courage and confidence is bravely carrying on. It is with a deep faith instilled in both by their mutual ambitions for the future of their loving children that she is able to go on.

It is our duty to see that time does not dull our interest or memory fade our friendship for this fine family—may his soul rest in peace.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, the tragic and untimely passing of our colleague, the Honorable CHARLES A. BOYLE, is a loss to all of us. As a fellow member of the Illinois delegation, I can testify to the tremendous esteem and respect in which he was held in the district he served and by all who associated with him.

We knew him to be a man of great ability, knowledge, and genuine and deep understanding of the problems of human life. In all his activities, he was gentle and unassuming. He was especially dedicated to the interest of the city of Chicago, and he firmly believed and practiced his personal political philosophy in a completely independent mind. In his service in the Congress of the United States, he served his district, his city, State, and Nation with great devotion.

I extend to Mrs. Boyle and their children my deepest sympathy.

Mr. NATCHER. Mr. Speaker, I join with the many friends of CHARLES A. BOYLE in expressing my sorrow at his untimely passing.

I subscribe to every tribute which has been paid him by the Members of the House and especially by the members of our Committee on Appropriations. CHARLES A. BOYLE represented the finest as a gentlemen and as a true statesman. He was kind, considerate, able, industrious, sincere, and courageous.

The city of Chicago and the State of Illinois suffered a great loss in the death of this outstanding Representative.

I join in expressing my sincere sympathy to the members of his family and his many friends.

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Speaker, I, too, wish to join with my colleagues in an expression of appreciation of the character of our departed fellow Member, and in the extension of sympathies to his widow and the family.

It was my privilege to have served on the Appropriations Committee with CHARLIE BOYLE. He was always friendly, he always had time for a gracious visit or an intelligent exchange of views on any existing mutual problem. CHARLIE BOYLE was an honest man, and as has been said here many times today, always seeking for the just and the equitable answer. He served with diligence and distinction on our committee and his untimely passing is a real loss to us and to the Nation.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, the tragic passing of CHARLIE BOYLE has brought real sorrow to all of those of us who were fortunate to be his friends.

His intense loyalty, his always warm and bubbling personality, and his always evident sincerity contributed richly to those who were associated with him not only in an official capacity, but in the many ways in which men come to appreciate and value their mutual friendships.

CHARLIE BOYLE was a lawyer with a keen and discerning knowledge and perception, but above all he was a warm human being who thought in terms of the welfare of people, in terms of the love and affection which he knew from his own family and which he would wish for all other families.

He was a liberal, but not a radical. He was a hard worker who knew the joys of real comradeship.

We shall miss him sorely and I, for one, shall feel his presence and a sort of obligation to strive even harder for those things to which he was devoted for the welfare of his own constituents and his country.

To Mrs. Boyle and all his family go our most heartfelt thoughts and prayers.

Mr. SHIPLEY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to take advantage of this opportunity to join my colleagues in the House in paying tribute to a great American, the Honorable CHARLIE A. BOYLE whose untimely death occurred recently.

During the first session of this Congress I had the privilege of serving with CHARLIE whom I considered a wise counselor, a friend, and a man whom I deeply respected. He has served for many years in this House with distinction and the loss of no longer having the benefit of his keen intellect and judgment will not only be felt by his constituents, but by the entire country.

I extend my sincere sympathy to Mrs. Boyle and their children in the loss of a devoted husband, father, and fine American.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, we were all deeply shocked at the news of the unfortunate accident which resulted in the death of our colleague, CHARLES BOYLE, of Chicago, Ill. He had served in three sessions of the House of Representatives and during that period of time had made an outstanding record as an able representative for his district, city, and State. CHARLIE BOYLE attained success in his chosen profession—the law—and also in public service by consistent work, application, and extending liberally of his services and time to the welfare of his friends and constituents. His district has indeed lost a representative in Congress who will be very difficult to replace. While a Member of Congress, he worked long hours to acquaint himself with legislation. He deligently followed up on all requests and demands coming from his community and by reason thereof had built up a personal following in both political parties which would have warranted for him a long service in the Congress of the United States.

CHARLIE BOYLE was the father of eight children and in recognition of his outstanding status as a father and family man he was selected as the "Chicagoland Father of the Year" in 1952 and 1953. His many friends in Chicago and in the Congress will miss him in the coming session and for a long time in the future.

I wish to extend to his wife and family my deepest sympathy in their bereavement.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, the House of Representatives has lost one of its ablest younger Members and each of us individually a good friend in the untimely death of Hon. CHARLES A. BOYLE, of Illinois.

CHARLIE BOYLE was a man who shared of himself generously. There was not a problem which any Member faced and with which CHARLIE BOYLE could help that did not get his personal attention. This, regardless of political affiliation. I know. As a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, Mr. BOYLE helped me a number of times with problems which came before that group. He gave unstintingly of his time and effort in these matters.

Later on we both became associated on the Committee on Appropriations and worked together closely as colleagues on the Subcommittee on Defense. All through the arduous hearings of last year CHARLIE BOYLE never failed to preserve his calm, his good nature, and his keen insight into problems both of a national and a personal type which came before our committee.

The House has lost a fine Member; the people of Illinois a fine servant, and I feel the loss of a good friend. Both Mrs. Weaver and I extend to Mrs. Boyle and the fine family our condolences upon their great and troubling loss.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I wish to join with my colleagues in expressing my profound sorrow at the passing away of our late friend from Illinois, the Honorable CHARLES A. BOYLE.

I had the pleasure of serving with him in this House during these past three Congresses. He was a man of exceptional ability and of firm beliefs. He was a good friend and neighbor and an outstanding legislator. The people of the 12th District of Illinois lost in his death a constant and outspoken champion of their interests.

To his widow and family I wish to extend my sincere sympathy. May they derive some measure of consolation in their bereavement from the thought that the good Lord has called CHARLES to be among His very own.

Mrs. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I wish to join my colleagues in the Illinois delegation in expressing our shock, our grief, our loss. The death of Congressman BOYLE leaves a void within our ranks that will not easily be filled.

Many would speak with truth of his capacity which was proven here by his rapid rise within our ranks. Many would praise—and rightly so—his devotion to his district, to his city, to his State, and to his country. I could join in each of these expressions with sincerity and wholeheartedness. I, personally, however, wish to call to mind and shall long remember those personal attributes of CHARLES BOYLE which made him a friend to every man. Such a friendly spirit, ever ready and true, is not often found in this world; and the loss of his friendship will be felt by each and every one of us who served with him here. He gave his help, his time, and, indeed, himself, without stint.

With his district I share the sense of loss that comes with the passing of a public servant so dedicated to the services of his people. To his family whom he loved so tenderly I send my deep and understanding sympathy.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues from Illinois and the hosts of others in the House who have expressed their sorrow over the death of the Honorable CHARLES A. BOYLE, who so ably represented the 12th District of Illinois in this body.

No one could have come in contact with CHARLIE BOYLE without developing a strong feeling of friendship for him because his whole personality generated warmth and affection and led people to know his great capacity to share himself with his fellow man. It was evident in his every action that he wanted to help his fellow man and that he wanted to participate in those things that lead to the achievement of happiness for others.

It has been said here this afternoon that CHARLIE BOYLE gave every indication in his devotion to his work that he thought first of the good he could do for others—for his community and for his country. This was his trademark. He worked night and day, tirelessly, to better the world he lived in. Well grounded in moral philosophy he quickly grasped the types of programs that appeared most likely to point to better conditions for those he represented in Congress.

As a legislator he quickly established himself as an effective leader. Few were more quick to analyze a situation than CHARLIE BOYLE. Few were more aggressive in fighting for worthy causes.

To his wonderful family I extend my heartfelt sympathy.

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, a tragic automobile accident on election night in 1959 has taken from us a beloved colleague, the Honorable CHARLES A. BOYLE. Upon coming to the House of Representatives at the beginning of the 84th Congress, CHARLIE BOYLE quickly made a host of friends among the Members—each of whom was pleased to be considered his friend during his entire service. In this body where oratorical competence is considered almost a commonplace he soon proved himself to be an outstanding and eloquent advocate. His eloquence—far from being an artifice—was simply an outward expression of the depth of his feelings and faith in the causes he espoused.

The energy and industry that CHARLIE BOYLE demonstrated in his congressional career, both in this Chamber and in the Committees of the Judiciary and Appropriations, had its origin in his youth when he worked his way through college. His powers of persuasive speech served him well in his chosen profession of the law which he practiced for a quarter of a century. He was exceptionally devoted to his family and to his professional and other activities and, despite the demands of an engrossing and active life, he never neglected anyone or any cause to which he was attached. His activities included membership in professional, fraternal, and other organizations which he served well.

It was in his family life that the admirable character of our late colleague revealed itself. His dedication to his wife and to his fine family of eight children brought to him the coveted honor of being chosen Chicagoland Father of the Year, 1952–53. To his family and to his countless friends within and outside the Congress I want to offer my sincere condolences. CHARLIE BOYLE will be truly missed.

Mrs. GREEN of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, it is with a very heavy heart that I have listened to these many words that have been said about our good friend and colleague, the late Honorable CHARLIE BOYLE, of Illinois. I have seldom been as shocked as I was when I heard of CHARLIE BOYLE'S untimely accident. I have seldom felt as deep a sense of deprivation as when I was told that he would not be with us in the future. But I can take some consolation from the memory of his courageous dedication to the principles in which he believed, and his inexhaustible supply of energy and enthusiasm with which he went forth to do battle for the goals his conscience set for him. CHARLIE BOYLE was a great Member of the House. CHARLIE BOYLE'S devotion to his work, and to the people whom he so ably represented, cannot be taken away from the aura that fills this Chamber by his passing. To Mrs. Boyle and their family I extend my deepest sympathy and my very best wishes.

Mr. CHELF. Mr. Speaker, I was shocked and grieved to learn of the untimely passing of our beloved colleague CHARLES BOYLE, of Chicago.

CHARLIE was a lovable, capable, sincere, intelligent, fearless, God-fearing, God-loving Member of this great body. He served his constituents with a devotion that truly inspired all of us. His ready wit—grin, and pleasant disposition, will be greatly missed. The Nation and Illinois have lost a noble son—a real Christian—a splendid gentleman and a fine legislator. May God rest his sweet soul in peace and bless his family always.

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Speaker, I should like to pay a brief but sincere tribute to the memory of the late CHARLES A. BOYLE, Congressman from Illinois who passed away on November 4 during the recess of the Congress.

I was privileged to serve on the Appropriations Committee with CHARLIE BOYLE and learned to admire and respect him greatly. He was an extremely active, capable, and forceful legislator. He served on our committee and in the House with distinction and honor. The news of his sudden and tragic death while the Congress was in adjournment came as a shock and we were all saddened to learn of his passing and his presence will be missed.

To Mrs. Boyle and the members of his family I extend an expression of genuine sympathy in their bereavement.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, our early meetings of this session are saddened as we think of old friends who are no longer with us. One loss comes home to me personally with particular force, that of the jovial, the energetic, the eloquent CHARLES A. BOYLE. We shall long miss and deeply mourn the loss of that forceful mind, that great heart. As a legislator, CHARLIE BOYLE was noted for his mastery of some particular fields of interest, growing out of his life experience, such as labor and transportation and housing; but it was for his human qualities that he was most notable. CHARLIE BOYLE loved people, individually, in illimitable numbers. He could not stand to see anybody pushed around, and he would not stand for anybody being pushed around, whether by other individuals, by organized groups, or by governments. He was a one-man task force, doing battle against injustice and tyranny and prejudice wherever he found them. May his soul rest in peace. Our hearts go out to his wife and eight fine children in their great loss. May the heritage of courage and vigor, of love and religious faith, which is their legacy from that good husband and father, console them in their affliction, and strengthen them for the hard tasks ahead.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, because Congressman BOYLE and I became close personal friends during the years we served together in Congress, I feel deeply bound to offer these remarks on his passing.

Shortly before the 1st session of the 86th Congress adjourned, I played golf with CHARLIE and later joined him at his home as I had done previously. It was always a great pleasure for me to be with the late Congressman BOYLE's family for it was truly a fine, typically American family. I shall never forget the pleasures of our association, socially and professionally. My late colleague from Illinois was one of the hardest working gentlemen I have known in my life; he was as direct and forthright in his approach to controversial issues as any man. I have never known him to lose sight of his basic objectives nor turn his back upon anyone who needed assistance. Nothing I can say at this time can add to what has already been said by so many others who knew and respected him as a person and a statesman. His untimely death was indeed a shock to all of us and his passing a loss to so many.

His achievements are a monument to his public service and his wonderful family, a reflection of his love for the Christian way of life that is the cornerstone of this great Nation.

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, the news of the tragic, untimely passing of Congressman CHARLES BOYLE struck us all a stunning and a crushing blow.

Only a short time before that fateful night, we had seen him in our midst—on the floor and in the halls of this great representative body—vibrant, vigorous, and in the full bloom of health and spirit—filled with the zest of life, immersed in his dedicated tasks and duties which he invariably faced and carried through with a seriousness of purpose, a wealth of knowledge, a driving determination, a gifted capacity and a lofty idealism that commanded the respect and admiration of every Member of the Congress and won for him widespread gratitude of the very many he had loyally served with such unfaltering zeal and effectiveness.

CHARLIE BOYLE was beloved by all his colleagues. He was instinctively kind and generous and intuitively responsive to the needs of the people.

Devout in religious beliefs and practices to which he was profoundly devoted, he possessed a broad, tolerant mind which encompassed and harbored in a very unusual degree love of his fellowman. In his generous heart he was the true, practical exemplification of the deeper, hidden meanings of the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man.

A sound thinker, an eloquent talker, an articulate forceful advocate of forward-looking, humane causes, a brilliant lawyer, a painstaking, indefatigable worker, Congressman BOYLE during his tenure in the House served with conspicuous ability, sincerity, and effectiveness.

CHARLIE BOYLE was stricken down at the very height of his powers, with the larger portion of a great and promising career still before him. His lamentable demise has left a deep void in this body and has brought genuine sorrow and sadness to all of us.

We cherished his noble character, his congeniality and warm, good fellowship just as we admired his ability and devotion to duty.

A great American and a great Christian gentleman has been called to his heavenly home. We join his bereaved family and many friends in mourning his loss.

But he has left a legacy of devoted service, and goodness, and kindness and warm fellowship here that will long be remembered, that will leave a deep imprint upon the memories and the annals of this great legislative body.

To his bereaved family, his friends and all those dear to him, with a heavy heart, I tender my deepest and most heartfelt sympathy. In their truly irreparable loss I pray that the Good Lord may solace them and bring them strength and courage to bear his passing with resignation to the divine will.

And may our beloved and dear friend and esteemed colleague, CHARLIE BOYLE, rest in heavenly and eternal peace.

Mr. MACK of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, we have suffered a great loss in the tragic death of our esteemed colleague, CHARLES A. BOYLE, of Chicago. He was an outstanding public servant, dedicated to his service in the House of Representatives. No one in recent years has served his constituents as faithfully and well. He was loved and admired by all who knew him. He had a host of friends in Illinois, not only in Chicago but downstate as well. He had many, many friends throughout the whole country.

CHARLIE BOYLE was one of the most astute politicians we have ever known in the State of Illinois. He was a very able attorney, a great legislator, and an outstanding father. He had great love for his family and lived by the laws of God. We were always proud to have CHARLIE BOYLE serve with us in the Illinois delegation. He was the type of man we like to have serve with us, and we shall all miss him greatly in the years to come.

I join with my colleagues in extending my sympathy to his gracious wife and his wonderful family. May God give them strength and guide them in the difficult years ahead.

Mr. O'BRIEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 401).

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Honorable CHARLES A. BOYLE, a Representative from the State of Illinois.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE LATE STEVEN V. CARTER

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COAD].

Mr. COAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may be permitted to extend their remarks in the RECORD regarding the life and services of the late STEVEN V. CARTER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. COAD. Mr. Speaker, we were all saddened last November 4 to learn of the passing of our colleague, STEVEN V. CARTER, who passed from this life exactly 1 year following the date of his election to the Congress from the Fourth Iowa District.

It was a privilege of mine to count STEVE as a friend. I knew him well, for not only had we traveled along the way together in the activities in which we were mutually associated, but upon one occasion STEVE stayed with us for several days in our home here in Washington. It was at this time that I came to know, better than I ever had before, the sterling qualities of STEVEN CARTER.

STEVEN V. CARTER was born in Carterville, Utah, on October 8, 1915. At the age of 14 he moved to the town of Lamoni, Iowa, where he attended and graduated from the Lamoni High School and Graceland College. He later attended the University of Iowa and was graduated from there in 1937 with a B.A. degree in economics and political science. Continuing his education, he graduated from the State University of Iowa College of Law with a juris doctor's degree in 1939. He practiced law in Leon, Iowa, for 19 years. This practice was disrupted by his service in the U.S. Navy in the South Pacific during World War II.

His career as an attorney in the town of Leon was highlighted by his great interest and activity in his community's civic affairs. His interest and faith in the youth of America was demonstrated by his contributions to the Boy Scout activities in his community. He was a member of Grand River Lodge, No. 78, A.F. & A.M., the Lions Club, Veterans of Foreign Wars, the American Legion, and the executive board of the Southern Iowa Council of Boy Scouts of America.

The highlight of his life, as far as civic activity and accomplishments were concerned, was that he was elected to the 86th Congress on November 4, 1958, the first and the only Democrat to be elected from the Fourth District of Iowa. Not only did I know STEVE as a friend, but I knew him as one who was a real American.

What I have just presented to you were the facts of his life. These were, in part, some of the accomplishments of his life. But, they do not in total represent the attributes and the values, the desires and the dreams of our friend and colleague, STEVE CARTER. STEVEN V. CARTER had qualities above these mere facts of his life, and he never gave up on anything. STEVEN and I shared, together, in the campaign activities in which we were both interested. I knew STEVE as an ardent campaigner. I knew him to be a hard worker. All of his people were impressed by his courage as a valiant fighter; and, found him to be a gracious and a humble winner. He was a successful attorney, practicing law in his home community. He was a devoted man and was respected in the area in which he lived. But, exactly 1 year after his election, the dread disease of cancer took him from our midst. However, during his year of service in these marble halls, STEVE CARTER made a record. I remember well the day he introduced a bill calling for a crash program against the great diseases of our time—heart disease, multiple sclerosis and cancer. For here, on that day, stood a man who even then was caught in the grasp of a fatal malady—but a man who refused to turn in retreat. It was this kind of perseverance that exemplified the life of this man CARTER. It was this perseverance that was equaled only by STEVE'S mild manner, by his patience, and by his thoughtfulness. STEVE never had an easy life. He knew of life's trials. He had been confronted with life's tribulations. He had experienced, at times, defeat. But STEVE CARTER never gave up, for his life and all of life to him was a challenge. And so he fought on. STEVE CARTER was still fighting for life when he slipped away quietly in the early morning hours of November 4, 1959.

It is true that from our low spiritual level, our dim eyes cannot, through the smoke and fog, see the coming dawn. But, if we climb up to the mountain peaks of faith in the eternal God, we can see above, beyond, and below the horizon where the dappled mists of saffron and purple are blushing into crimson and yellowing into gold. The sun is rising.

> Out of the darkness and night
> The world rolls into light,
> It is daybreak everywhere.

I am sure that this is as STEVE found it. I want today to express my profound sympathy and sorrow to STEVE'S widow, Lucy, and to their two sons, Steven A. and Charles.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WOLF].

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, there is a sadness in my heart as we begin this new session of the Congress, for I miss keenly the presence of a former devoted Member of this body—a colleague of mine from the State of Iowa—the esteemed STEVEN V. CARTER, who left us last November.

A greater example of dedication to duty has seldom, if ever, been set than that set by STEVE CARTER. Day after day when he should have been conserving his energies, he was in these Halls, and in this Chamber, looking out for the interests of the people of the Fourth District of Iowa and of the Nation. Few men have a finer record.

In the late days of the last session, his tremendous courage and devotion came through when he had to be physically carried to the Chamber to cast his vote on several pieces of very significant legislation. Many Members commented on this strength of purpose which drove a man in his fast failing health to perform to the last ounce of his physical endurance. This expression has been used in reference to many men, but in the case of my dear friend, STEVE, I am convinced that this devotion undoubtedly took several months off of his life.

I consider it an honor to add my voice to others here today in tribute to STEVE and in gratefulness for the privilege of knowing him and working with him. I shall miss him dreadfully in the coming months, but his courage and steadfastness of purpose will forever remain an inspiration to me and to all who knew him.

I sincerely hope that STEVE'S son, Steve, will follow in the footsteps of his father. He has already demonstrated real leadership working at his father's side here in Washington and in Iowa. To the Carters I can say, hold your head high and walk in the knowledge of your husband's and father's great public and community service.

Mr. COAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. JENSEN].

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, it is with a heavy heart that I rise to pay my respects to our departed friend and colleague, STEVE CARTER. I had never met STEVE CARTER until he was elected to this House of Representatives, but it did not take me long to know that here was a man with deep and wonderful convictions; a devoted father, and husband, a friendly man. There was something big and fine and good about STEVE CARTER that you liked deep down in your heart.

I had many talks with STEVE. I inquired about his health. He always said, "BEN, I think I am going to make it. I am feeling better." Now I am sure he wanted most to make you, his friends, feel better; that was his nature. He scattered sunshine even to the last minute of his good life. He came to this House in a weakened condition when most men would have said, "No. I cannot make it." Not STEVE. He came to the floor of this House of Representatives and cast his vote according to his best conscience, and he did it with a smile. Never did I know a more friendly man than STEVE CARTER. I mourn his passing.

I extend my deepest sympathy to his good wife and children and loved ones.

I attended the funeral of STEVE CARTER, and there I saw the great respect and admiration which his friends and neighbors had for this good man. There they were—a house full of people at his home and a church full of people and flowers heaped high. In fact there were not enough seats in that large house of God to seat the folks who came to pay their last respects to their friend and our friend, STEVE CARTER.

God rest his soul.

Mr. COAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I knew STEVEN CARTER for many years. He represented a district where several dozen of my relatives lived. He practiced law in this district in a wonderful, quiet, Christian town called Leon, where he was also laid to rest on the west slope of a hill overlooking a quiet valley. He not only was a leading citizen of that area, but he was also typical of those who live so close to the soil, to nature, and to God, and to life itself.

He was clean, quiet, temperate, and understanding of others. He could disagree without being disagreeable. He was also very persistent, as he quietly pressed forward for the things in which he believed.

He ran for Congress for 10 years before being elected. Each time, becoming known to more people for the man he was. He loved his work and he stood at attention looking straight forward and never yielded to the pain and suffering until he fell.

As he became weaker physically, he became even stronger in his determination to serve as he had promised. He greatly taxed his remaining strength to come to the House floor and to work for those things he had promised to support. He hoped that his sickness would disappear, but he hoped even more that his colleagues would give all their support to research and other measures to spare others of suffering.

He acquired a wide knowledge of public affairs and his mind was very clear as to the direction he should move. Even when he was suffering with pain, he suffered no difficulty in finding his direction. His attitude was an inspiration to all of us to work harder in our years upon this earth, and a reminder of the value of our time.

Few men have worked as long to serve such a short time, and few Members who served a long time ever did more in a long time than he did in a short time.

The Fourth District of Iowa has lost a constructive and aggressive legislator and though this body has lost his personal affiliation for all time, we have permanently gained from the impression STEVEN CARTER made upon us. Like his family, we have lost from the fact that we can gain no more from his personal association.

To his family, I express my deepest sympathy—our heart goes out to them. May the Lord bless them all.

Mr. COAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SCHWENGEL].

Mr. SCHWENGEL. Mr. Speaker, I most certainly want to add my words of tribute to this fine gentleman with whom we have had the privilege of serving in this great body. While I did not have the privilege many of you experienced of knowing him over a very long period of time, I did get to know him early after he came to this body and learned to respect and to love him because when it was necessary for him to make a decision he found it possible to see what was right and then took his position on that matter.

Our friend and colleague the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. JENSEN] spoke about his tolerance and fairness, and I am sure that we agree with him. I remember one occasion when we were appearing in behalf of an important project in his district and mine and certain statements were made involving another Member of Congress, a member of the other party, one of our colleagues. STEVEN CARTER saw that this was wrong and he took a position then and there to get the record straight even though it concerned a person very high in his party. I cite this to show that he had very deep convictions, and this is one of the reasons I think he was able to make the outstanding record he made even though he served so short a time and under very difficult circumstances. I remember particularly his attitude. Knowing of his condition, like many of you, I went by to pass the time of day almost every day when he was on the floor, and it was refreshing to know that even while in your own heart you felt there was not much chance, yet he had an optimistic attitude about this condition of his, and when inquiry was made about his health, he said: "Well, I believe I am getting along all right, I am going to fight this through; I am getting stronger," and so forth. This optimistic attitude was good, I think, not only for himself, but also was particularly good for his colleagues. It is something that I learned is a good thing and I hope in the future it may stand me in good stead, as I am sure it will with those who have associated with him in this great body.

I noted, especially in my conversations with him, his interest in worthwhile things.

I was pleased to note at the funeral services, which I attended, that the man in charge—I have forgotten his name—called attention to the interest Mr. CARTER had in the Scouts, in the public schools, in the project that meant an improvement for the community, and particularly the youth of the community. This is an outstanding thing to note in a public servant.

Many things could be said about STEVE CARTER that would be an inspiration to all of us. I think it is a good thing for our colleague from the Sixth District of Iowa [Mr. COAD] to take the floor today and give us this opportunity to pay tribute to him and to have these things spread upon the record of the House.

I, too, join with my many colleagues on both sides of the aisle in extending sympathy to his fine family who will mourn his loss. But it must be an inspiration for them to know and to realize it was a great privilege of theirs, as it was to us, to know this man and to have lived with and under his influence.

There is a statement on a public building in my town which goes something like this, and I think of it when I think of men like STEVE CARTER:

What a man does for himself dies with him. But what a man does for his country, his friends and his Nation, lives forever.

In that sense this man will live, as many others who have gone before him, are living with us today and have their influence.

I join with my colleagues and with his friends, neighbors, and constituents of the First District of Iowa in extending sympathy to his very fine family.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert the speech by Dr. Roy Cheville which he gave on the occasion of STEVE CARTER'S funeral in Leon, Iowa.

MOUNTAINS OF FAITH

Jesus talked to his followers about faith that would remove mountains. In his own daily life he lived by ascending mountains. He never waved a wand to remove some obstructing hill in order to make life easy. He faced life honestly and seriously and recognized there were mountains before him and at times around him. He climbed and from such vantage points saw in eternal perspective what could not have been seen so clearly in the valley. He surveyed life from the summits of mountains of faith. This day, we are reflecting on the life of a friend who faced the blockading effects of life's crags and peaks and climbed them to experience larger vision.

ON A MOUNTAIN

A few years ago a friend and I set out to climb Mt. Tamalpais in California. At the foothills the fog hung low and mists seemed to enshroud us. We met a hiker coming who had turned around when half way up the mountain. "It's wet and you can't see anything," was his warning. We pushed on and at the top, the sun broke through and we saw in glorious perspective the plains and hills. Beyond was the ocean, symbolical of the great unknown. The sun lightened the scene with cheerful warmth. We stood in silence for a while. There is little to say in the greatness of earth's wonders. There were only two of us. We do not take large companies when we climb up mountains of faith. Often we have to go alone. Many times we have to go in faith that the sun will break through.

Once I went with a company of youth to climb Mt. Manitou in Colorado. The hurrying crowd called out, "Who'll get there first?" They scampered away without looking to the right or to the left. On reaching the top they called out, "Who'll get down first?" How little they saw! How much they missed. Some of us walked a while and then looked out over the valley. Then at the top the glorious picture stretched out before us. We have to get up high enough to see life in its totality and in its relationships. Close up to Notre Dame we may see only a gargoyle staring at us. At a distance we see the total historic cathedral in proportion and balance.

THE MOUNTAIN VIEW OF MOSES

In the sunset years of Moses' life, he climbed Mt. Pisgah and saw the promised land. He had given his life to a people who did not understand him. He had dedicated himself to taking his people toward the country that he would never enter. A man of smaller spiritual stature might have complained and given up. Not Moses. He saw with God. This is the simple story.

"And Moses went up from the plains of Moab, unto the mountains of Nebo, to the top of Pisgah * * *

"And the Lord showed him all the land of Gilead, unto Dan * * *

"And the Lord said unto him, 'this is the land which I sware unto Abraham, and unto Jacob * * *

"I have caused thee to see it with thine eyes, but thou shalt not go thither."

Here was faith of the first order. Moses saw his place in an ongoing purpose that was to last beyond his day. A measure of a man is in that to which he devotes his life, for which he gives all he has. Little souls want comforts and awards at the immediate moment. Great souls give themselves to things that may not be realized in their lifetimes. They believe the worthful will come to pass. They are happy in moving forward toward the goodly land.

The letter to the Hebrews refers to the roster of the faithful. It speaks of those who gave because they saw the distant scene that would never be their homeland.

"These all died in the faith, not having received the promises but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them." Hebrews 11:13.

THE PISGAH VIEW

Once Sir John Adams used a term in a class on comparative education that has enriched my life. He spoke of "the Pisgah view." He urged us all to look at things from the mountain view. From this loftier height we would be able to see these ways. (1) In relative importance. Sometimes we are too close to see relative worths. Life becomes, as an Archbishop of Canterbury told students of Oxford, like a store window in which a prankster came in over night and changed the price tags. We get our values confused. With clearer perspective some things fade into insignificance. (2) In long-time perspective. We see things so often in a 5-minute outlook. Reinhold Neibuhr, when accused of being pessimistic, told his friend that he would have a pessimism about the decades but a faith in the eons. (3) With the procession of explorers. From Mt. Pisgah we see with prophetic spirits who have seen with God. Up here we sense with Flaubert that "the principal thing in this world is to keep one's soul aloft."

BEYOND TIME MEASUREMENT

On the mountains of faith there are no time clocks, no calendars. The eternal process and purpose moves on. We see it moving on and on. We get into it and go forward. Recently, I visited with a professional architect who had lost his eyesight. Day and night meant nothing to him. He was touching reality without these limitations. Still he was dreaming big things. He was climbing the mountains of faith. I say to such as he—

We live in deeds, not years; . . .
In feelings, not in figures on the dial.
We count time by heart throbs.
He lives most who thinks most,
Feels the noblest, acts the best.

Today I am not concerned about how long my friend lived in calendar years. I am not interested in recording mileage. Rather, am I interested in what he saw when he climbed his Mt. Pisgah.

LIVES THAT IMPEL US

Lives of courageous faith stir us to climb. Recently I read the story of Rick Fox who went from Colorado to Baylor University. He was to study medicine. He was the top man of his class the first year. In his second year recurrent pains in his stomach sent him to the doctor. The man of medicine was honest, "Rick, I've got to give it to you straight. You have terminal cancer and you can't live." Rick's reply, "Let me have 30 minutes alone with God." He came back ready for the future. "Use me as a laboratory specimen. I will memo my reactions." To his classmates came this injunction, "Be a good doctor." He wanted to go home to his loved ones in the mountains. Sixty students lined the way to the airport as he was wheeled to the plane. The silver plane was lost in the clouds. Two days later he was gone. These medical students could never forget his word from his mountain of faith, "Be a good doctor."

THESE EXPRESSIONS OF HOPE AND FAITH

Today I hold to the fore these expressions of hope and faith that showed up in the mountains of faith of Steven Carter. (1) The intent to achieve education and professional life. He was not born in wealth and served on silver platters. There were no rich relatives to put him forward in school. There was dogged determination to make his own way. And this he did. (2) The facing of reality. He knew quite well his health hazard. He did not indulge in neurotic escapism. He did not moan, "Why did this have to happen to me?" He did not turn to complaining. He saw things squarely and honestly. With him I associate these lines of Longfellow—

Fear not in a world like this
And thou shalt know ere long,
Know how sublime a thing it is
To suffer and be strong.

(3) The last mountain of faith. In the closing days when departing came nearer, the serenity of faith stood out. There was concern about what matters most in the family, in the political arena, in the personal commitment to God.

AFTER GRADUATION

Out of my educational background I have come to think of death as a graduation day when we move on into the University of Eternity. Only those have right to eternity who find life so full, so short, so that an eternity is needed. For others eternity would be a monstrous boredom with nothing to do. Steven Carter just got well started in the business of living. With his questing spirit, he should find the University of Eternity appealing. From Mt. Pisgah he sees the great stretches of the promised land yet to be explored.

It has been said that those fear death who have lived poorly here and that those who wish death are those who have weakened here. The healthy man neither fears death nor desires death. He lives meaningfully each day and wants more time, but when the trumpet sounds that his present mountain-climbing is over, he stands confidently on Mt. Pisgah, with God at his side and says, "It is well."

THESE WORDS FROM THE MOUNTAIN

Today, let us climb our own mountains of faith. Here let us find release from the pressure of things of passing worth. Here let us see the wholeness of life. Here let us meet the God of Life, as Moses did, and be assured of His concern for us. Here let us dedicate ourselves to things that go beyond our time. We look ahead in hope that something we have done and are doing will be carrying our people on toward the land of promise.

In the quiet we hear what Moses said to Joshua. I hear Steven Carter saying it to his sons—

"The Lord thy God will go before thee."
"Fear not, neither be discouraged."

And we hear what Moses said to his people—

"The eternal God is thy refuge, and underneath are the everlasting arms."
"As thy days, so shall thy strength be."

This day from the mountain of faith we hear God pointing us to the land to be, to the life we shall make come to pass, through our common endeavor with God's guidance. We hear Moses' watchword to Joshua as the heritage of Steven Carter to us, "Be strong and of good courage."

Mr. COAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROONEY.]

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all our hearts were saddened by the tragic passing of our distinguished colleague, the Honorable STEVEN V. CARTER, who died at the Bethesda Naval Hospital on last November 4.

At the time of his passing he represented the Fourth Congressional District of Iowa. His short service in the House of Representatives was under the shadow of the dreaded disease of cancer and much of his time was spent in and out of hospitals. He showed great spunk and courage in his efforts to recover from his severe illness. He impressed me as an able and intelligent legislator and he will be sadly missed by the House of Representatives, the people of his district, the State of Iowa, and the Nation.

His wife and sons have my deepest sympathy in their great loss.

Mr. COAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. ALBERT].

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I join the Iowa delegation in paying this word of tribute to STEVE CARTER. STEVE was a Christian gentleman, he was one of God's noblemen. He was my friend.

Although during the last weeks of his service in this House it was obvious that he was burdened with an affliction from which he would probably never recover, he spread the sunshine of optimism wherever he went. He was a person who never gave up. He was friendly; he was kind; he was courageous; he was considerate, even to those who disagreed with him.

We have lost a fine Member who served with us for only a short time.

I extend my deepest sympathy to his widow and children. May God be with them in their bereavement.

Mr. COAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Utah [Mr. KING].

Mr. KING of Utah. Mr. Speaker, on the sad day of November 4, 1959, after a lingering but valiant struggle, there passed from our midst our distinguished colleague, the Honorable STEVEN V. CARTER, who, for 1 year, had so ably represented the Fourth District of Iowa in the Congress of the United States.

I rise on this occasion to pay tribute to STEVE, only in a small measure because of the fact he was born in my district, the Second Utah Congressional District, but principally because I loved him. He was a great and a noble man.

Congressman CARTER was a man of quiet but indomitable courage. The circumstances of his passing, with which we are all familiar, evoked the spontaneous admiration and respect of every Member of this body.

STEVE was passionately devoted to the democratic processes. In his way of thinking, every citizen had equal responsibility to give expression to his opinions and to invigorate his Government by aggressive participation in its processes on the local level. Whatever was worth believing in was worth fighting for.

In his mind the great champions of democracy were its honest citizens who, without expectation of office or reward, played their part year after year in familiarizing themselves with the vital national issues and in casting honest votes for honest government. His greatest heroes were those who bore arms for the preservation and the advancement of peace.

STEVE was gentle but fearlessly devoted to the accomplishment of his chosen objectives. Although his tenure in Congress was short, his influence was long and penetrating. He affected my own life for the good, and I will remember him affectionately as long as memory continues.

I express my condolences to his lovely wife, Lucy, and to his splendid sons, Steven A. and Chuck.

Mr. Speaker, on November 5, Elder Edmund J. Gleazer, Jr., of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, and a classmate of STEVE's, gave tribute to him at a memorial service held in Washington, D.C., which I extend at this point in the RECORD as a part of my remarks:

STEVEN V. CARTER: MEMORIAL SERVICE, NOVEMBER 5, 1959

(By Edmund J. Gleazer, Jr.)

In just a few minutes the Carter family will leave for Iowa. Before they go there should be some acknowledgment of what they have achieved, not only for themselves, but for many others whose lives they touched. I use the word "achieved" purposefully.

STEVEN CARTER, Lucy, and Steven A., and Chuck, have met adversity and turned it into victory. They have fought battles during this past year such as all mortal men must fight, and out of it all there has arisen, for those who have the eyes to see, a tender love, not confined to their family; a faith tried and refined; and a quality of courage worthy of the great ones who have come to this Nation's Capitol in its finest hours. I call this achievement; not easily won, but a consummation of vision built upon dedication and interwoven with an honest desire to serve one's fellowmen.

STEVE CARTER wanted to serve his country in the Halls of Congress. The privilege was granted but not for a period of long duration. Many of his days during this past year were spent in the hospital. But although the time was short, the force of his life will be felt far beyond the Eighty-sixth Congress; because it is in passing through the valleys of uncertainty and pain that men discover their common humanity and look with gratitude upon those of their number who bear their load without complaining; who can give a sincere smile when the going becomes most difficult.

I have not wanted to picture STEVE as a paragon of virtue—he would chuckle at any such attempt. However, it was my good fortune to know him best in the last few weeks of his life. We had been college friends years ago—but in those easy-going, breezy days, the real dimensions of a person's soul were not probed or measured. It has been in these recent sober times that we, together and with his family, began to plumb the depths of human experience and the understanding love of God. And in this growing fellowship with the Father of us all we found our hearts much more closely joined. Communication can be immeasurably richer when men commit themselves to uncharted areas in the realm of faith and hope and beyond the edge of knowledge. And in this setting there came to all of us with new assurance that "The eternal God is thy dwelling place, And underneath are the everlasting arms."

In these few moments we memorialize not only STEVEN CARTER but most surely those virtues and qualities without which a nation of free men cannot stand. These qualities are forged in the heat of the conflict of good with evil; the opposition of self-centeredness and the common welfare; the struggle between men's aspirations for a better world and their content with the present. I want to say, as the body of STEVEN CARTER leaves this city, that I saw him on a hospital bed reveal in the way he met the most serious issues of life the essential elements of leadership in a democracy.

His going, therefore, is not a retreat but rather a signal to us at a most critical time to reassess the purposes to which we dedicate ourselves during the span of our days. The time is all too short for any one of us. We are called to answer our own commissions. So, let us turn to our unfinished tasks in the belief that "there is a God in heaven who is infinite and eternal, from everlasting to everlasting the same unchangeable God, the framer of heaven and earth and all things which are in them."

It is this faith that gives support to our virtues.

It is in this faith that we find true fellowship.

It is by this faith that we humbly and repentantly seek His benediction for each of us.

Mr. COAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HECHLER].

Mr. HECHLER. Mr. Speaker, we are all going to miss STEVE CARTER. We are going to miss his courage. We are going to miss that gentle voice back of which was a determination and a conviction of steel.

Frequently I used to sit by STEVE CARTER in this Chamber and shared with him some of his hopes and aspirations for his State, his Nation, and for all humanity. I remember very clearly the maiden speech which STEVE CARTER gave in this Chamber. I was sitting next to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. YATES] when Mr. YATES said, "Close your eyes a minute and listen." And we closed our eyes and we agreed that the voice of STEVE CARTER sounded very similar to Raymond Massey's famous lines in the play "Abe Lincoln in Illinois." This was not by chance, because there was much of Abraham Lincoln in STEVE CARTER'S philosophy and personality.

Yes; we are going to miss STEVE CARTER, but his spirit will always remain with us.

Mr. COAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RANDALL].

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, in the memorial remarks I am about to make I shall be very brief, because I think that is the way STEVE CARTER would have wanted it. Coming here in March I was junior even to the short tenure of STEVE'S, and yet sitting here in this Chamber time and time again he was helpful. He pointed out some things that he thought I ought to know that had not been explained to me.

It has been said here this morning that there is something unusual about any U.S. Representative who can represent 300,000 to 400,000 people. But, there was something very unusual about STEVE CARTER. He had a quiet, mild manner, but underneath it all there was a philosophy of life that I enjoyed hearing him express.

I think you can tell something about a man by being at his last rites. There is an old adage that a prophet is not without honor except in his own country, but I saw there that Sunday afternoon at Leon, Iowa, genuine grief expressed, heartfelt grief. No church was large enough to house the assemblage and being the only Member of this body outside of the Iowa delegation there, I observed something that I shall never forget. Hundreds and hundreds and hundreds of people passed by that bier and hundreds more waited outside in that cold temperature, unable to get into the school building, which was filled to capacity.

Yes; this House will miss STEVE CARTER in this ensuing session. I am sure we all extend our sincere condolences to his fine wife, Lucy, to his right arm, Steve, Jr., and to the younger son.

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Speaker, when I came to Washington early in December of 1958 to make some preliminary arrangements, STEVE CARTER was the first new colleague I met. At that time he appeared to me to be in good spirits, in good health, and strong. As time went on, I made good friends with all of the new Members from Iowa. The thing that I remember most about STEVE CARTER was that he was a man who thought, thought deeply, and thought well. He expressed himself well. He stuck to very high principles. Not so many of us are able to shed much light on this world of ours, but I am certain that STEVE CARTER lit a candle and that the candle that he lit will continue to cast a light for some time to come.

I know that I shall miss him. I know we shall all miss him. I extend my sympathy to his family and to the people of his district.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COAD. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I wish to join my tribute to the heartfelt tributes already paid here today to our beloved late colleague, STEVE CARTER. He was one of the first junior Members of the Congress that I met upon my arrival here last year. I know that early in the year he was making plans for the long pull; even after he knew that the risks were rising he continued to devote himself to the study of the problems facing the country, to the duties of this office and to the best of his strength and ability he was faithful in his performance of his duties of this office.

Late in the year he had high hopes that he had successfully surmounted the illness which beset him. Throughout the entire trying experience of last year STEVE CARTER showed that quiet courage, that patient devotion to duty, that hope for the future, that confidence in himself and in the Congress and in the Nation, and from his example all of us certainly can take renewed hope and renewed heart as we face our duties in the coming year, without STEVE. I wish to add my words of comfort to those who especially feel the loss of our beloved colleague.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, since the close of the 1st session of the 86th Congress, the House of Representatives has suffered a sad loss in the death of our friend and colleague, STEVEN V. CARTER, Democrat, of Iowa. Mr. CARTER, who had just reached his 44th birthday on October 8, died on November 4 at Bethesda Naval Hospital of an illness against which he had been making a gallant fight since 1957. I have been proud to look upon STEVE CARTER as a personal friend, and feel I had come to know him well, even in the brief time he has been with us as a freshman Congressman. He was a man of unselfish devotion to the public good, of high personal ambition and strong party loyalty, faithful to the trust his constituents had reposed in him.

As I said on a previous occasion, I repeat now, "STEVEN CARTER was one of the bravest men I ever saw in public service." The distinguished Speaker of the House of Representatives commented on the same occasion, the return of STEVEN CARTER to his seat in the House in September 1959, speaking for the membership of the House generally: "He has impressed all of us as an earnest, honest and able legislator."

I will never forget his courage and devotion to duty during the closing days of the last session when he came from the Naval Hospital in Bethesda to vote on an important measure that was being considered by the House at that time. His bravery and devotion to duty brought tears to the eyes of many members.

During his service in the House, brief though it was, Representative CARTER was successful in securing substantial benefits for his district, including an appropriation for a dam in the Des Moines River Valley and a missile tracking station, and sponsored several bills of national significance. Among these was a bill for a half-billion-dollar crash program against cancer, heart disease, cerebral palsy, arthritis, and multiple sclerosis. Another was to establish more effective controls over peacetime nuclear tests and over the disposal of nuclear wastes. His, too, is a proposed amendment of the United Nations Charter to promote the rule of law in international affairs.

STEVEN CARTER had served in the Navy in the South Pacific during World War II, and was an active member of both the Veterans of Foreign Wars and the American Legion. For 19 years he was a practicing lawyer in Leon, Iowa. A major interest of his life was Scouting, and for 15 years he served the movement as scoutmaster, cubmaster, and senior Scout adviser. He also served on the Executive Board of the Southern Iowa Area Council of Boy Scouts of America. His wife, his two sons, may mourn him proudly, as befits the heirs of one whose thoughts were noble, and whose actions brave, and who endured the onslaughts of his final illness with patient fortitude.

To Mrs. Carter and her loved ones, I extend my deep sympathy in their great loss and sorrow.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I learned with deep sorrow of the death of our fellow Member and friend, STEVEN V. CARTER.

He was a man of fine ability and strong convictions, and I have never seen greater courage in great physical suffering.

He was devoted to the veterans' cause, and it was fine to work with him. The people of Massachusetts who met him at the time of the hearings on veterans' affairs at the statehouse liked and appreciated him so much.

We extend our sincere and heartfelt sympathy to his loved ones.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, STEVEN CARTER was a marked man from the beginning of his term in the House of Representatives. He had won a signal political victory, then had exhibited for all to see a devotion to duty and courage, in the face of physical afflictions, which are only the gifts of the very great and true men.

Knowing STEVE and sharing with him his beliefs and ideals was a privilege which none who have had it will soon forget. If he was taken away from us before he could complete his work, he should feel assured that he left a host of friends determined to plow ahead. The rich memories which he has left behind will be augmented, Mr. Speaker, by the many thoughtful and generous gifts which, at the wish of STEVE and his family, have been turned into dollars to find a cure for the dread disease that struck him down.

The Eleanor Roosevelt Institute for Cancer Research, to which these gifts have been entrusted, is not only deeply grateful for the thought of STEVE, which the donors have so eloquently expressed, but for the responsibility which these gifts give to that institute to strive in every way to make that help bring to reality through research the cure, or cures, which may lie ahead for thousands in the future.

To all his friends, but especially to his wife and his family, go our warmest and deepest expressions of friendship and sympathy and the hope that the placque which will be erected at the Eleanor Roosevelt Institute for Cancer Research in STEVE'S honor will symbolize, in some part at least for them, the many contributions which STEVE made to others during his life.

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, I join my Iowa colleagues in expressing deep regret at the passing of my good friend, STEVE CARTER. Although I did not know him before he came to Congress, I soon learned to admire and respect him. His unfortunate illness brought out the best in him. In spite of his pain and suffering he faced life with a smile. During his short service in the House, STEVE CARTER demonstrated his ability as a good public servant.

I attended the funeral of STEVE CARTER where I saw demonstrated, at the large attendance, the love and respect in which he was held by his friends and neighbors, who knew him best. STEVE CARTER well served his day and generation.

Mrs. Hoeven joins me in extending our deepest sympathy to Mrs. Carter and all members of the family.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I did not know STEVEN CARTER for a long time. He sat in this body for a single session. But I can say that in that period his demeanor and work made it obvious that his death is a great loss to his district, State, and Nation. I pay tribute to him as a man of devotion to his country who in the space of a year won the esteem of his colleagues and promised to be a great legislator.

STEVEN CARTER served his Nation in many ways: as an officer in the U.S. Navy, as a leader in Boy Scout work, as an active layman in the Christian Church, and as a citizen fulfilling civic responsibility. For 10 years prior to his election he was a worker in the political activity of his district.

I think he will be long remembered here despite his short tenure; and that memory will be one of a fine, outstanding American who gave great service to his Nation. I extend to his family my deepest sympathy for their great loss.

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. Mr. Speaker, along with others who have previously spoken, I want to add my word of tribute to the late STEPHEN V. CARTER, who, in the brief time he served in the House of Representatives, did so much to make his mark in this body and to cause us to remember him for many years to come.

It was my good fortune to have our late colleague assigned to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs as one of the newly elected Members of the 86th Congress. I named him to the Subcommittees on Administration and Insurance, and, also, he was a member of a special subcommittee, headed by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MITCHELL], which was appointed to specifically consider three important administrative proposals. Of the three proposals, House bill 6319 became Public Law 86–146 and established new safeguards relative to the acumulation and disposition of certain funds of incompetent veterans. This proposal will result in the saving of large amounts of money to the Federal Government, while, at the same time, protect the rights of all of those unfortunate veterans who have been declared incompetent.

The second proposal upon which the gentleman from Iowa worked was House bill 7106, which was enacted as Public Law 86–222, and which repealed the forfeiture procedure applicable to veterans' benefits and, in effect, ended the double penalty which has been applicable to veterans who made misstatements or gave false information concerning a claim before the Veterans' Administration.

The enactment of both of these proposals was aided by the advice and counsel of the Honorable STEPHEN V. CARTER, and we were looking forward to his same calm, judicial approach to the other matter pending before this subcommittee, namely, judicial review for veterans' claims.

Our colleague was held in the highest esteem, respect, and admiration by all of those who served with him on the committee and this was true regardless of party. His kind manner and his willingness to cooperate in any endeavor to which he was assigned will be cherished by all of us who knew him while he was a member of our committee. To his wife and children I extend my heartfelt sympathy and know that the ability and integrity of this servant of the people is a great source of comfort to his family in their hour of loss.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, although I knew the Honorable STEVEN V. CARTER but slightly, he has left with me a memory that cannot be erased. It was on one of the closing days of the first session. The vote was crucial and it was bound to be close. I looked around and saw, a few seats removed, STEVE CARTER, slightly bent forward, his face chalky white, obviously laboring in great pain. The end was not far away, and he knew it. Yet he was there, at his post of duty, to answer his name when the roll was called. I shall always think of it as one of the sublimest exhibitions of courage, in the challenge of duty, that ever has come to my attention.

My heart goes out to his widow and the members of his family. He left them the inspiration and heritage of a noble life lived nobly, with faith and with courage, to the very last painful moment.

Mr. KYL. Mr. Speaker, in the congressional campaign of 1958 I was a political opponent of the late STEVEN CARTER. He was my Congressman the year he served in the House.

In the years I have known STEVEN CARTER he was a Christian gentleman and a man of courage. He was a good father, and his love of young people took his efforts beyond his family to activities with the Boy Scouts and other youth groups. He was a good neighbor, and the support his home people gave him at the political polls is proof of the high regard in which he was held by those who know him best.

For his fine family there should be solace in the fact that his life was dedicated to that which is right, and that he will remain an inspiration for many who had the benefit of his guidance.

Mr. COAD. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 402).

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Honorable STEVEN V. CARTER, a Representative from the State of Iowa.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE LATE ALVIN R. BUSH

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FENTON].

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of sadness that I announce to the membership of the House of Representatives the sudden death of our beloved colleague, ALVIN R. BUSH, of R.D. 2, Muncy, Pa., on Thursday, November 5, 1959, at the Williamsport (Pa.) Hospital.

Following the adjournment of the first session of the 86th Congress, Mr. BUSH, as was his custom, toured a great part of the counties in Pennsylvania which comprised his district—the 17th.

On Monday evening, November 2, he made his annual visitation to the Jersey Shore Rotary Club where he made his last speech.

Tuesday morning, November 3—election day—apparently in good health, he voted in his home precinct. He retired that evening at 10 o'clock.

Mr. BUSH awoke at 4:45 a.m. on Wednesday, complaining of chest pains and he was immediately transferred to the Williamsport Hospital. He suffered another attack that same night and his condition became critical. He passed away on Thursday, November 5, at 12:30 p.m.

AL BUSH, as he was affectionately called, was one of the finest gentlemen that I ever met. He was kind and always considerate of his fellow man.

I became acquainted with AL several years before he came to Congress, and with his election to the seat vacated by former Representative Robert F. Rich, who was not a candidate for reelection, I learned to know him for the gentleman that he was.

Mr. BUSH was elected to the 82d Congress on November 7, 1950. He was reelected every 2 years, and consequently was in his fifth term. During his service in the House he served on various committees, such as the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Department, and the Committee on Public Works. During the present term of Congress he was a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. BUSH served his constituency with distinction. His paramount thought at all times was the welfare of his country, his constituents, and family.

Born June 4, 1893, in Boggs Township, Clearfield County, Pa., he attended a country school until he was 13 years old, at which time necessity forced him to go to work in the coal mines.

In 1913 he obtained a job as a mechanic's apprentice in a Clearfield machine shop, after which he opened up a small repair shop in Philipsburg, Pa.

During the First World War, Mr. BUSH served with the Army in France. After his release from the service, he returned to Philipsburg. In 1920 he purchased a small bus line serving the surrounding rural communities. He drove the buses himself and repaired them at night.

Mr. BUSH migrated to Williamsport in 1932 at a time when buses were replacing trolley cars in that city. He, and later his son, Alvin C. Bush, operated the Williamsport Transportation Co. until a few years ago when they sold it.

Mr. BUSH purchased and modernized the Wyno Farms, making it one of the show places of his area. His Guernsey herd is recognized as one of the finest in the country.

He was a member of the Methodist Church, the American Legion, the 40 and 8, Veterans of Foreign Wars, various Masonic organizations, Pennsylvania Breeders Association, and the Consolidated Sportsmen of Lycoming County.

He had been a director of the Muncy Valley Hospital and the Lycoming County Fair Association, relinquishing these because his presence in Washington prevented him from attending meetings.

He was a director of the Lowery Electric Co., and Radio Station WWPA, and served on the Advisory Committee of the Williamsport Salvation Army.

AL and his dear wife, Lucinda, visited at my home, and Mrs. Fenton and I visited them at their home. We shall indeed miss him.

In addition to his wife, Lucinda M., a daughter Shirley, wife of John H. Eck, and a son, Alvin C. Bush, survive; also four grandchildren.

AL BUSH was the type of citizen who is so greatly needed in our country today. A real American, he was a living example of what can be accomplished by hard work and individual initiative. There never was a finer exponent of the free enterprise system that has made the United States the greatest country of all. His belief in his fellow man, his strong character, and his will to assist all, endeared AL BUSH to men and women in all walks of life.

AL BUSH'S achievements and success were his own. I feel that in his recent years he found much self-satisfaction in a job well done.

I have lost a real and sincere friend, his community, district, and State have lost a faithful and very able public servant, and our country has lost a capable, conscientious statesman.

Our country has lost a great champion for the liberties and freedoms which we still enjoy, and which, as AL so often said, did so much for him.

I know that God will give Mrs. Bush and her loved ones the strength and fortitude to carry on in the days ahead, and to help keep the Bush name the fine symbol of Americanism that it has stood for in so many years of life and progress.

The heartfelt sympathy of myself and my family go out to Mrs. Bush and her family in their great loss. May God comfort them all is my most sincere wish.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to our colleague, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK].

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, last fall, shortly after adjournment of the 1st session of this 86th Congress, it was my pleasure to visit the 17th District of Pennsylvania at the invitation of our late colleague, the Honorable ALVIN R. BUSH.

I could not possibly have had a more gracious host, a statement all of you here who knew AL BUSH as I did will understand and appreciate.

It was my privilege, during that visit, to serve as guest speaker at a banquet in Williamsport at which AL was honored for his years of service here in the House of Representatives.

As one who had developed a deep affection for our gentle colleague, you may be certain I took full advantage of the opportunity to offer my testimonial to AL BUSH, in his presence and before his people as a dedicated American.

How happy I am now that this opportunity came my way back in October of 1959.

And how shocked and grieved I was to learn, such a short time after this happy experience at Williamsport, that death had come to a wonderful person who had so recently appeared to be in good health, and who so obviously was enjoying the challenge of his career here in the Congress.

The AL BUSH I knew was a hard-working, versatile, and effective Representative who understood his responsibilities and who met them.

But I think the picture all of us will carry through the years when we remember our friend is that of a man who was extraordinarily kind to everyone he met, regardless of station. This was no kindness born of expediency. AL BUSH was kind because he genuinely liked people. And they liked him.

I will not soon forget the warmth of the reception given him by so many of his friends and neighbors at the dinner meeting in Williamsport.

And I shall always be grateful that the chance came my way to take part in such a richly deserved tribute to a dear friend.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to our colleague the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARENDS].

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, it is impossible for me to convey in words the loss I have felt with the passing of my friend AL BUSH. As we begin the work of this session, all of us will miss the contribution he invariably made to our deliberations.

AL was a quiet, unassuming man who was always seeking ways that he could be helpful. He loved people, and he had innumerable friends. To him friendship was something to be cherished, and there was not anything he would not do to aid a friend. He was a personal friend of mine whom I shall never forget. I think he was an inspiration to all of us, for whom we had great affection and respect.

AL BUSH was a man of convictions, and he had the courage to express them and to adhere to them, come what may. He sought nothing for himself. He was not interested in fame and glory. He was solely interested in doing that which he thought would best advance the welfare of the people he represented and the country as a whole.

Before coming to Congress he was a successful businessman. As a member of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, he brought to the deliberations of that committee his knowledge and experience in the field of transportation. At one time he was general manager of the Williamsport Transportation Co. and served as president of the Pennsylvania Bus Association.

When he was called to the Great Beyond and met his Maker, I am sure it was said to him, "Well done, my good and faithful servant."

I extend my sincerest sympathy to his fine wife and family. I hope they can find some consolation in the knowledge that AL left footprints on the sands of time that serve to guide us all for fruitful living. He now lives peacefully in the heavenly temple of the Lord.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, ALVIN BUSH succeeded Robert Rich here. He came from a district which has always had the highest type of representation and he maintained that type himself. He always stood for the legislation which would help the people of the United States and against that tendency that has been so apparent in recent years to waste the people's money and break down our Government. I admired the way he handled himself in his work here and everywhere else very much.

His people suffered a great loss. At the same time we can be thankful that they had a man of such a fine character here.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BOW].

Mr. BOW. Mr. Speaker, in the loss of ALVIN BUSH we have lost one of God's great noblemen. I felt that AL BUSH was the exemplification of all that was good in this country; one who was able to rise to the heights in this House from an humble beginning; one who never lost humility, which endeared him to all of us.

He came to Congress in the same session that I came here. He was a good and close friend of mine throughout these years. His great concern for so many he cared for is what made him stand apart from others. He had a sister who lives in my district in the State of Ohio, who suffered a tragedy a little over a year ago. AL BUSH came to me at that time and asked me if I would be of service to his sister if the occasion ever arose. She came to me not long ago and told me many things about AL BUSH as a young man, and how he rose, and the things he did. It was a great story of Americana.

I am proud to join with the Members of Pennsylvania in extending to his family our most sincere sympathy, and to his sister who I am sure misses him.

It is hard to fill the place left by so noble a man as Mr. BUSH.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAGUE].

Mr. DAGUE. Mr. Speaker, the untimely passing of our esteemed and respected colleague, ALVIN R. BUSH, has cast the pall of sadness over this opening session and as we mark his vacant place we are not inclined to question the wisdom of the Master in taking him from us, but instead we pause to ponder the uncertainty of this life's journey and the temporary nature of these associations we hold so dear.

AL BUSH appreciated the privilege of service in this body as must any humble man who had found his greatest joy in the simple companionship of friends and loved ones in a country environment. But AL BUSH, to a greater degree than most, brought to the Congress an awareness of the needs of his people and a determination to preserve for them those fundamental freedoms for which his forebears fought a dictatorial king and his minions.

The ties between AL and myself were unusually close since we represented districts embracing comparable philosophies. In addition, we enjoyed the confidence of each other and a perusal of our voting records will reveal that we saw eye-to-eye on most of the issues. Truly, Mr. Speaker, this House has not sustained a loss since I have been here that has touched me more deeply.

His widow and his children are bravely carrying on as AL would have them do and I know that they have been greatly comforted by the assurance that his colleagues in the Congress are joined with them in mourning the passing of this great and good American. May our guardian and guide have them in His care and keeping.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROONEY].

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, it is with a feeling of genuine sorrow that I raise my voice in brief but sincere tribute to the life and character and public service of Hon. ALVIN RAY BUSH, of the 17th District of Pennsylvania, who passed away on last November 5.

At the time of his death ALVIN BUSH was the third-ranking Republican on the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. While I did not have the years of close personal association and contact with him that some of his other colleagues may have had, I nevertheless acquired a very high regard for his character and ability as a legislator. He was a dignified and kindly gentleman, a fine man who always impressed me as one who could appreciate the problems of his fellowman.

I extend to my friend's wife and daughter and son my deepest sympathy.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MUMMA].

Mr. MUMMA. Mr. Speaker, I have listened intently to the remarks covering the life, character, and public service of my friend ALVIN BUSH, and I join in them believing they have been absolutely correct, not an overstatement, but in fact understatements. I think I can qualify as a witness to Mr. BUSH's character for I believe I was closer to him than any Member of this House without making any exception. He was my "ride"—you know what that means—I traveled with him up to Harrisburg and back for 9 years and I got to know him very well. In addition to that I ate dinner with him practically every night we were in town; and some of the boys can attest that we ate lunch together almost every day. In all these trips and meetings, we would have an opportunity for quiet discussion of issues in Congress that seemed to be most pertinent that week. Thus I got to know AL BUSH, and I concur in everything that has been said about him.

One thing in his life that was omitted is the fact that he was also the owner of a bus system serving suburban Harrisburg. At one time they had 100 buses in operation. AL used to tell me how he started work in a clay mine, which is sort of like a coal mine, and how he repaired those trucks at night. It is amazing to think of his building of that bus company in Harrisburg with 100 buses under his operation.

I miss him greatly, and from what I have heard here this afternoon, think that this is the general attitude of many, many Members of Congress.

I extend my very deepest sympathies to his wife and to his daughter, whom he was especially proud of, as well as to his son Alvin, a chip off the old block.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. ALBERT].

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to join the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania and other colleagues in paying this word of tribute to ALVIN BUSH. Although we sat on different sides of the aisle, he was my friend. There is no aisle between friends in this House.

ALVIN BUSH was a man of few words but of deep convictions. He was a warm friend to all of those who had the privilege of knowing him.

ALVIN BUSH was a valuable Member of this House. He was a great character. This has been testified to today by Members who have had the opportunity to know him longer and more intimately than I.

I shall miss him.

I join in extending sympathy to his widow and children.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LANE].

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, we pause to honor the memory of our departed colleague, Representative ALVIN RAY BUSH of the 17th Pennsylvania District.

He came to us in 1950 to speak for the people of upper Pennsylvania and served them faithfully until his death in 1959.

To the many of us who are lawyers by profession and limited to the ways of urban life, it was a pleasure to work with AL BUSH who opened our eyes to the enduring values and beauties of the bountiful countryside that he loved so well.

AL was a breeder of purebred Guernsey cattle, and an authority on bus transportation. With this background he was able to bridge the difference between rural and urban problems and give us the benefit of his practical advice.

His assignment to the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee was a recognition of his painstaking ability to analyze all sides of a problem before making up his mind. And when he did, you could be sure that his opinion was sound.

Representative BUSH was an overseas veteran of World War I, a 32d degree Mason, and a devout member of the Pine Street Methodist Church.

He was as steady as they come, blessed with the self-reliance and the character that constitute the true strength of our people.

To his widow and his children we send the comfort of our sympathy and our gratitude for his services to the Nation.

AL BUSH was a loyal friend and a highly respected public servant.

He has joined the heavenly company of those whose lives on this earth were distinguished by the good they did for others.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUIGLEY].

Mr. QUIGLEY. Mr. Speaker, in one brief 48-hour period during the first week of last November this body lost three distinguished Members and for myself three very good and very dear friends.

I had the privilege of knowing STEVE CARTER less than a year. I first made his acquaintance when he came to the 86th Congress, and I had the honor of serving with him as a member of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs of the House.

My close friendship with CHARLIE BOYLE and his wonderful family began some 5 years ago when we both entered this body as freshman Members of the 84th Congress. However, my friendship with AL BUSH predates my arrival to this body by many years. My first meeting with Mr. BUSH was not as a congressional colleague or as a political opponent. Our initial association was that of a lawyer-client relationship. As a young lawyer I had the task of guiding Congressman BUSH and his son through an acute crisis in their family bus business. During that case I literally lived in the Bush household. Ultimately the crisis passed. We all survived it, and I not only had the grand and satisfying reward of winning the case but of beginning a close and intimate friendship, a friendship which membership in this House has enkindled and a friendship which political differences never dampened.

Mr. Speaker, as we pause today to pay tribute to each of our departed colleagues who were with us when we adjourned last September and who are not with us today, and as we attempt to extend our condolences to the Bush, to the Boyle, and to the Carter families, I cannot help but note that in each of their untimely passings there is a stern reminder of the task remaining before us. AL BUSH was felled by a heart attack. CHARLIE BOYLE died in a tragic highway accident. STEVE CARTER was a victim of the dread disease cancer. The unanswered challenge to bring under control each of these three couriers of death and suffering and heartbreak, cancer, heart disease, and highway accidents, is a task that lies before us. There is nothing that we can say or do that will return our colleagues to us or to their families and the words we say here will at best be inadequate to console the families in their great loss, or even in paying a deserving tribute to each of our three departed colleagues.

However, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that in the days ahead we can here in the Congress do everything that it is possible for us to do to see to it that each of these three scourges which have struck down our colleagues are ultimately banished from our midst so that they will no longer be permitted to impose the heavy hand of sorrow they have visited on the families and friends of AL BUSH, CHARLIE BOYLE, and STEVE CARTER. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, in paying this tribute that no more fitting tribute could be paid to three great and good men.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to my distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN].

Mr. CURTIN. Mr. Speaker, when the roll of Members was called today opening this new session of the Congress, ALVIN BUSH was not here.

Last November 5 this great legislative body lost, by death, a most distinguished Member and I, together with many others, lost a close and dear friend.

ALVIN BUSH was a real Christian gentleman. He was one of the finest men I have ever had the privilege of knowing and one whose counsel and help was always available to any who sought it. He represented the 17th District of Pennsylvania in this Congress for 9 years with distinction and ability. He lived a full and rich life, dedicated to his family and to the unselfish service of his constituents and of his country.

He was a dedicated family man, completely devoted to his lovely wife and two fine children. They have my most sincere sympathy.

It is, therefore, with a heavy heart that I join in these services today for I have lost a loyal friend, his family has suffered an irreparable loss, and Pennsylvania has lost one of its most distinguished sons.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLIKEN].

Mr. MILLIKEN. Mr. Speaker, I, too, would like to join with my colleagues in paying my respects to AL BUSH. I did not have the privilege of knowing him very long, but when I learned of his death I was greatly shocked and very much upset. I had known AL BUSH only in this 1st session of the 86th Congress, but I had learned to love him and respect his judgment. Many days, when trying problems and questions were before us, AL BUSH was a very steadying hand to me and to the Pennsylvania delegation. I know that I, the Pennsylvania delegation and the Members of the U.S. House of Representatives will miss and remember AL BUSH for a long time.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. MCINTIRE].

Mr. MCINTIRE. Mr. Speaker, the passing of AL BUSH takes from this body and from among us as individual Members, one of those whom we had learned to love. It was my privilege to enjoy his friendship, and to go to him for counsel and a discussion of the issues over these last 8 years that I have served in Congress.

I considered it a rare opportunity to count him among my personal friends and to realize that his warm friendship was most sincere, that his philosophy was basically entrenched in the great principles upon which this country was built; and that to the extent to which his influence could be felt, these were the principles that he wanted to see maintained as we wrestled with the great problems before this great body.

It was indeed with a distinct personal loss that I learned of his passing. Mrs. McIntire joins with me in extending our deepest sympathy to Mrs. Bush and the members of the family.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who desire to do so may have 5 legislative days in which to extend their remarks on the life and services of our late colleague, AL BUSH.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, universal regrets among all Members of Congress were expressed at the untimely death of ALVIN RAY BUSH. For 9 years he served the 17th Pennsylvania District with credit and distinction. As a man of wide experience in business affairs, his sound, solid judgment was appreciated by all who knew him. He had but a single ambition and that was to serve faithfully and well his native State and the country. A great legislator and a great American died when AL BUSH passed away. Because of our warm friendship, his death was a deep personal loss to me. To his good wife and family I extended my heartfelt sympathy. In their hour of sorrow they can be comforted by the great service he did for mankind.

Mr. ROBISON. Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege to serve during two congressional years with the late ALVIN R. BUSH, of the 17th District of Pennsylvania.

AL was not only a colleague and congressional neighbor but, I am proud to say, a friend as well. Whenever matters of mutual interest to our adjoining districts arose, I was always afforded the courteous and capable cooperation of my friend. He will be sorely missed.

AL had many attributes which I am sure all of us found admirable. Among all those, I shall particularly remember his homespun humor, his constant cheerfulness even under adversity, and, above all, his integrity and devotion to the principle laid down by Henry Clay, in 1829, that, "Government is a trust, and the officers of government are trustees; and both the trust and trustees are created for the benefit of the people."

May I join with my colleagues in expressing my deepest sympathy to his family.

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Speaker, to those of us who were privileged to know AL BUSH there must come the real feeling of having lost a true friend. His was a constructive life and any review of AL BUSH's nearly three score and ten years here discloses all of the fine things that a truly patriotic, community-minded, and home-loving man can do to make this a better place in which to live, progress, and seek wholesome happiness.

We will all miss AL BUSH. I want to join with my colleagues in extending our sincere sympathies to his widow and his family.

Mr. LAFORE. Mr. Speaker, it is with a deep sense of personal loss and sadness that I rise to pay tribute to my distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania's 17th District, the late ALVIN R. BUSH.

He was a good man beloved not only by those who shared his political philosophy, but by those who disagreed.

As a new Member, I profited much by his experience, advice, and understanding.

His untimely death was not only a great personal loss but a loss to the State and Nation he served so well.

I would like to express my heartfelt sympathy to his family.

Mr. FLYNT. Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleagues in expressing my sorrow in the unexpected and untimely death last fall of our admired and respected friend, ALVIN R. BUSH. Congressman BUSH and I had served continuously on the same committee since I first became a Member of Congress.

He was a pleasant and affable associate in the work of our committee and in the work of the House of Representatives. He was an able and respected Representative of his State and district and a beloved Member of this body. He was a warm, personal friend.

Those of us who were closely associated with him knew him as a man of high integrity and character. He displayed intense interest on legislative matters which came before us, and he made valuable contributions to the legislative work during the entire period of his service as a Representative in Congress.

I shall always remember AL BUSH as a devoted public servant of ability, strength of character, humility and gentle nature. I shall also remember him as a devoted personal friend.

Mrs. Flynt joins me in extending to Mrs. Bush and their children our deepest sympathy, and we share with them their sorrow.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, on November 5, 1959, the Nation lost one of its outstanding citizens in the death of our colleague and my good friend ALVIN R. BUSH, who for many years represented the 17th District of Pennsylvania in a highly efficient manner.

AL, as he was commonly known, was born and reared in Boggs Township, Clearfield County, in my congressional district. Many of his relatives are my constituents and have told me over a period of years of AL's early life in the Clearfield-Philipsburg area in Pennsylvania. Like many successful Americans, AL BUSH began life in humble circumstances—as a matter of fact in the coal mines—and by diligent efforts he advanced himself in the business world and at the time of his death was one of central Pennsylvania's most successful and outstanding businessmen.

AL's experience as a soldier in World War I, his success in the business world, and his willingness to help and understand the problems of his fellow man were recognized by the residents of the 17th Congressional District when they sought a capable successor to former Representative Robert F. Rich upon the latter's retirement from Congress. AL was elected to the 82d Congress, November 7, 1950, and since taking his seat in January 1951 he not only established himself as an able legislator but endeared himself to his colleagues through his friendliness and his love for people.

The death of AL BUSH leaves all of us with a heavy heart because we have lost a loyal friend and distinguished colleague. To Mrs. Bush and the children, I extend my deepest sympathy with the fervent hope that they will receive a measure of consolation in the knowledge that AL BUSH through his exemplary life has left many fond memories that will be cherished by the countless friends who deeply mourn his sudden death.

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, it is with great sorrow we record the passing of our very good friend and colleague, ALVIN R. BUSH—one of Pennsylvania's outstanding Representatives. His loss will be keenly felt by the Pennsylvania delegation and our State.

AL, as we called him, was a man who loved his district, State, and Nation; and served them well. He was intensely devoted to the interests of the people he represented.

He was always calm, and strong, and self-confident, and treated everyone with great courtesy. AL was always congenial and affable and by his kind deeds and many useful services he evidenced a great love of people.

He was a humble and kindly man whom one admired as companion and friend; always considerate of everyone; a man who added much to our daily lives with a kind word for everybody.

He was an honest, conscientious, and loyal legislator, always looking after the welfare of his district and State. He was a firm believer in the principles of liberty and our American way of life, with the highest concepts of citizenship.

His devotion to and love of country was something to be admired; always ambitious to uphold and defend the fine ideals and traditions of our Nation. He strove mightily to attain those objectives which he thought were for the best interests of all our people and his work in the House of Representatives was useful and constructive.

In a life such as his perhaps the thing most to be admired was the fact he was a good citizen and a devoted American; a man who contributed much to the building of his community, State, and Nation.

We will miss his fine friendship and companionship and it is with great sorrow we record his passing. To his family I extend my deepest and heartfelt sympathy.

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Speaker, permit me to take this means of paying a sincere tribute to the memory of our late colleague ALVIN R. BUSH of the 17th District of Pennsylvania who passed away last November 5 during adjournment of the Congress.

I was shocked and saddened to learn of his untimely passing.

For many months ALVIN BUSH and I had offices practically adjoining and I learned to know and love him greatly. He was a remarkable man in many ways—one of fine ability and dedication to his district, State, and Nation. He lived a rich and full life of unselfish service to his family, friends, constituents and country and will be sorely missed by all.

To Mrs. Bush and members of his family I extend an expression of genuine sympathy in their bereavement.

Mr. MEADER. Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, it is a human tendency to go along from day to day performing our routine tasks and experiencing intervals of pleasant enjoyment until abruptly we are confronted with the realities of life and death. Such was the shock I experienced upon the sad news of the passing of my good friend, my colleague and office neighbor, AL BUSH.

AL BUSH was a good citizen. In this body of 437 men and women, which we like to think of as the outstanding institution for self-government by the people of all time, AL BUSH, in his quiet way made a most significant contribution. He was not the flashily articulate exponent of popular causes nor one to engage in the repartee and clash of congressional debate. But, with his friendly smile and a devotion to his country and the principles which he deeply believed would further her best interests, he diligently ministered to the needs of his constituency. Both in his participation in the work of his committees, and in the deliberations of the House itself he cast his votes and made his decisions for the benefit of all Americans.

It would be impossible to dislike AL BUSH. He genuinely liked others, and all of his colleagues, whatever their political views or their personal natures, could not help but return the genuine friendliness of this man.

Mr. Speaker, this House needs orators, it needs pioneers, it needs strategists, but it also needs friendly, right-thinking men and women. That is why we all will miss AL BUSH.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, among the familiar faces for which we find ourselves looking in vain, as the 2d session of the 86th Congress swings into action, is that of my respected and valued colleague of the Pennsylvania delegation, Representative ALVIN R. BUSH, of the 17th Congressional District. The news of AL BUSH'S sudden heart seizure, on November 4, and death in Williamsport Hospital on the following day, brought shock and sorrow to me, as to all who knew him. AL BUSH was a devoted public servant, putting his business astuteness and his energetic determination into the advancement of the sometimes unpopular cause of governmental economy. Much of our legislation, over the past 9 years, has profited from the vigilance and good sense of ALVIN BUSH. His knowledge and experience in the field of bus transportation were often called upon, in his work with the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and with the Subcommittee on Transportation and Aeronautics.

It will long be remembered to his credit that he was an enthusiastic supporter of little league baseball, and proud of the claim of Williamsport, in his district, to have founded little league baseball. In the past session, he had sponsored a resolution to establish a National Little League Baseball Week.

We shall miss his aid as a legislator, but more than that, in the days ahead, we shall miss his quiet, friendly presence, and the feeling that, whatever our differences, we were all trying to accomplish a task together, for the common good of our Nation and of our home districts.

To Mrs. Bush, to their children, Mrs. John H. Eck and Alvin C. Bush, and to the many others who knew and loved AL BUSH, I offer my sincere and heartfelt sympathy.

Mr. RHODES of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues in paying tribute to ALVIN R. BUSH, one of the outstanding members of our Pennsylvania delegation. His untimely death brought sorrow to those of us who were privileged to serve with him on the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee.

AL BUSH was admired and respected for his humbleness and sincerity. He was a conscientious legislator with strong beliefs and courage of his convictions. We will all miss his contribution to our deliberations in the crucial months of this session.

To his family I extend my heartfelt sympathy.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, in the death of AL BUSH, the country, the Congress, and the people of the 17th Congressional District of Pennsylvania lost the services of a most capable legislator.

AL BUSH was a man of outstanding character, ability, and great courage. His affability and warm smile brightened many days for all of us. Personally, his friendship and consideration will always be one of my precious memories.

Again, I extend to Mrs. Bush and the family my deepest sympathy.

Mr. SAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, if any Member of the House was more genuinely liked by his colleagues than ALVIN RAY BUSH, his service ended before I entered Congress.

Many, many close friendships are established here on Capitol Hill. Like shipmates in wartime, we forge innumerable and indissoluble fraternal bonds in the course of our meetings and conversations. Our debates may sometimes reach a high degree of intensity, but when we recess or adjourn the combatants walk out together in much the same spirit of amity that prevails at the close of an athletic contest when victim and vanquished join arm in arm as they leave the arena.

ALVIN BUSH and I sat on the same side of the aisle and our political convictions were largely parallel; thus in the 9 years we served together, conflicts in our views on issues to be decided in this legislative body were infrequent. But it would have made no difference if we had never shared the same opinion. His host of friends here today whose voting records show no taint of similarity with that of our departed colleague will concur unanimously.

ALVIN BUSH did not think about a person's pedigree, his background, his party affiliation, or his political philosophy. As he was a good man, he enjoyed associating with good men. Of him it can be truly said "He lived by the Golden Rule." He was a deeply religious man, and his Creator's precept on love of one's fellow man was inherent in his character.

Through a geographical advantage, I was able to spend more time with ALVIN BUSH than most Members of the House found possible. Our families were close and I visited his home and enjoyed many an hour there with him, Mrs. Bush, and their fine children. My life has been enriched by their homelife with its warmth, enthusiasm, and sincerity.

Anyone whose accomplishments are akin to those of ALVIN BUSH could justly be proud of his record, but here was a modest man who discounted what he had done because his only concern was to serve his country and his fellow men so that they and their progeny might live in an atmosphere conducive to a wholesome life in the service of their God. His career bespeaks his ability, determination, and zeal. He went overseas in the defense of his country in World War I, then picked up where he had left off and went on to success as a businessman. With all these interests, he took time to participate in civic affairs and to become active in hospital work. He was a devout church member, and he accepted public service with a spirit of extreme responsibility and dedication.

Our friend has gone to his reward, but his warm personality and inspiring camaraderie will always be appreciated by everyone who ever had the pleasure of knowing him and of sitting with him in this Chamber. God grant him eternal peace.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution.

HOUSE RESOLUTION 403

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Honorable ALVIN R. BUSH, a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE LATE WILLIAM LANGER

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. SHORT].

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, during the congressional recess my State of North Dakota suffered a grievous blow. Our senior Senator and the dean of our North Dakota delegation, Senator WILLIAM LANGER, passed away at his home here in Washington, D.C. I believe it is fitting and proper that we here in the House pay tribute to him today.

Senator LANGER'S passing was a loss to North Dakota and its people, but his death is also a loss to the Nation. Few people in history have seen fit to champion the cause of the underprivileged to a greater extent than our senior Senator. His tactics in accomplishing his end objective were sometimes rather spectacular and earned for him the name of "Wild Bill," but to his friends out West this was more of a tribute than a criticism.

BILL LANGER served as Governor of North Dakota in the drought and depression years of the thirties, and earned the lifelong gratitude of North Dakota farmers for some of his drastic actions in keeping farmers from becoming victims of bankruptcy.

My brief remarks today in no way do justice to the stature, the personality, and spectacular career of our Senator LANGER from North Dakota. Those who knew him well will understand what I mean.

Born a North Dakota farm boy, he was endowed with the mental capacity to graduate from Columbia Law School as valedictorian of his class, and voted by his class as their colleague most likely to succeed. His life's record of achievement confirmed the confidence expressed in him by his classmates.

While BILL LANGER's political life was stormy and feeling ran high at times in traditional North Dakota fashion, none of this feeling ever extended to the members of his family. The Senator's wife and four daughters were held in the highest esteem by everyone. Mrs. Langer suffered for many years with cancer and passed away only a few short months before Senator LANGER's death. I know that all of my colleagues join with my wife and me in extending to the Langer girls and their families our heartfelt sympathy in their loss.

An indication of the high regard in which the Senator was held by his home folks was demonstrated when hundreds of North Dakota citizens turned out in below-zero temperatures for his burial beside his wife in their family cemetery at Casselton, N. Dak., only a short distance from where the Senator was born.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROONEY].

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, I should like to join my colleagues in the House in paying tribute to a good friend and highly capable legislator, Hon. WILLIAM LANGER, of North Dakota, who died on last November 8.

I held Senator LANGER in high esteem and affection from the time I first came to the House of Representatives in the 78th Congress and admired him over the years for his consistent efforts on behalf of legislation beneficial to our postal employees and other Federal workers. As a member of the Senate Post Office and Civil Service Committee he played a great part in improving the pay and working conditions of Federal employees. He was one of the principal supporters of legislation which established a new liberalized formula for computing retirement annuities.

Men like Senator LANGER are sadly missed and I shall always think of him with fond memories. He was a great and courageous American and I extend to his daughters my deepest sympathy.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who wish to do so may be permitted to extend their remarks in the RECORD regarding the life and services of the late WILLIAM LANGER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, it was with profound sorrow that I learned of the passing of the late senior Senator from North Dakota, the Honorable WILLIAM LANGER. He was my close personal friend for many years. In courageous dedication to what he believed to be right, and in the championing of little people whom to defend was to invite the vengeful wrath of publicized respectability, he was matchless. I hope that the story of his life, with its lessons of devotion to duty regardless of the cost or consequence, and its inspiration to faith and courage in the doing of good deeds, will not be lost to succeeding generations. In the life and career of one of the most colorful statesmen in American history, and one of the giant champions of the oppressed in an era now closing, there is rich material for the biographer.

The Nation and all mankind is the loser with the close of an era when after every election the word came over the wires from North Dakota: "Again the people have rallied behind BILL LANGER and Usher Burdick."

To the family of this noble man and of his fine wife, his inspiration and coworker, and by whose side he now rests in a cemetery in North Dakota, goes my deep sympathy.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, the Nation lost a distinguished Senator and North Dakota a great champion on November 8, 1959. On that day, the State's senior Senator, WILLIAM LANGER, died in his sleep at his home in Washington at the age of 72, ending a 45-year political career.

WILLIAM LANGER, who was born on a farm near Casselton, N. Dak., on September 30, 1886, served as State's attorney for Morton County between 1914 and 1916; as North Dakota attorney general between 1916 and 1920; and as Governor for two terms between 1932 and 1934 and 1936 and 1938. In 1940, he was elected to the U.S. Senate and for three terms thereafter.

In 1918, he married Miss Lydia Cady of New York, who stood by his side during his career. She died only 3 months before her husband.

WILLIAM LANGER's name virtually became synonymous with that of the Nonpartisan League, the reform movement known as the political prairie fire. In 1916, he was the league's first successful candidate for North Dakota attorney general.

BILL LANGER, as he was affectionately known by his constituents, had a deep compassion for the underdog. Consistently, throughout his long political career, he carried the standard of the poor and the oppressed against the rich and powerful, without regard to the consequences.

The small farmer, the working man, the small businessman had no better friend.

With BILL LANGER in Washington, North Dakotans knew they had a friend at court, for he conscientiously considered the problems, no matter how trivial, of all his constituents—friends and foes.

For many, BILL LANGER's humanitarianism is best remembered in the troubled 1930's, when as Governor, he took bold action to relieve the terrible burden that depression and drouth had brought to the people.

This vital, interesting personality will be sorely missed but dearly remembered by thousands of people.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 404).

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Honorable WILLIAM LANGER, a Senator of the United States from the State of North Dakota.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased Senator.

The resolution was agreed to.

Year: 19_____

REPORT

P	QUARTER

NOTE ON ITEM "A".—(a) IN GENERAL. This "Report" form may be used by either an organization or an individual, as follows:

(i) "Employee".—To file as an "employee", state (in Item "B") the name, address, and nature of business of the "employer". (If the "employee" is a firm [such as a law firm or public relations firm], partners and salaried staff members of such firm may join in filing a Report as an "employee".)

(ii) "Employer".—To file as an "employer", write "None" in answer to Item "B".

(b) SEPARATE REPORTS. An agent or employee should not attempt to combine his Report with the employer's Report:

(i) Employers subject to the Act must file separate Reports and are not relieved of this requirement merely because Reports are filed by their agents or employees.

(ii) Employees subject to the Act must file separate Reports and are not relieved of this requirement merely because Reports are filed by their employers.

A. ORGANIZATION OR INDIVIDUAL FILING:

1. State name, address, and nature of business.

2. If this Report is for an Employer, list names or agents or employees who will file Reports for this Quarter.

NOTE ON ITEM "B".—Reports by Agents or Employees. An employee is to file, each quarter, as many Reports as he has employers, except that: (a) If a particular undertaking is jointly financed by a group of employers, the group is to be considered as one employer, but all members of the group are to be named, and the contribution of each member is to be specified; (b) if the work is done in the interest of one person but payment therefor is made by another, a single Report—naming both persons as "employers"—is to be filed each quarter.

B. EMPLOYER.—State name, address, and nature of business. If there is no employer, write "None."

NOTE ON ITEM "C".—(a) The expression "in connection with legislative interests," as used in this Report, means "in connection with attempting, directly or indirectly, to influence the passage or defeat of legislation." "The term 'legislation' means bills, resolutions, amendments, nominations, and other matters pending or proposed in either House of Congress, and includes any other matter which may be the subject of action by either House"—§ 302(e).

(b) Before undertaking any activities in connection with legislative interests, organizations and individuals subject to the Lobbying Act are required to file a "Preliminary" Report (Registration).

(c) After beginning such activities, they must file a "Quarterly" Report at the end of each calendar quarter in which they have either received or expended anything of value in connection with legislative interests.

C. LEGISLATIVE INTERESTS, AND PUBLICATIONS in connection therewith:

1. State approximately how long legislative interests are to continue. If receipts and expenditures in connection with legislative interests have terminated, ☐ place an "X" in the box at the left, so that this Office will no longer expect to receive Reports.

2. State the general legislative interests of the person filing and set forth the specific legislative interests by reciting: (a) Short titles of statutes and bills; (b) House and Senate numbers of bills, where known; (c) citations of statutes, where known; (d) whether for or against such statutes and bills.

3. In the case of those publications which the person filing has caused to be issued or distributed in connection with legislative interests, set forth: (a) Description, (b) quantity distributed; (c) date of distribution, (d) name of printer or publisher (if publications were paid for by person filing) or name of donor (if publications were received as a gift).

4. If this is a "Preliminary" Report (Registration) rather than a "Quarterly" Report, state below what the nature and amount of anticipatted expenses will be; and if for an agent or employee, state also what the daily, monthly, or annual rate of compensation is to be. If this is a "Quarterly" Report, disregard this item "C4" and fill out item "D" and "E" on the back of this page. Do not attempt to combine a "Preliminary" Report (Registration) with a "Quarterly" Report.

AFFIDAVIT

NOTE ON ITEM "D."—(a) In General. The term "contribution" includes anything of value. When an organization or individual uses printed or duplicated matter in a campaign attempting to influence legislation, money received by such organization or individual—for such printed or duplicated matter—is a "contribution." "The term 'contribution' includes a gift, subscription, loan, advance, or deposit of money, or anything of value, and includes a contract, promise, or agreement, whether or not legally enforceable, to make a contribution"—Section 302 (a) of the Lobbying Act.

(b) IF THIS REPORT IS FOR AN EMPLOYER.—(i) In General. Item "D" is designed for the reporting of all receipts from which expenditures are made, or will be made, in accordance with legislative interests.

(ii) Receipts of Business Firms and Individuals.—A business firm (or individual) which is subject to the Lobbying Act by reason of expenditures which it makes in attempting to influence legislation—but which has no funds to expend except those which are available in the ordinary course of operating a business not connected in any way with the influencing of legislation—will have no receipts to report, even though it does have expenditures to report.

(iii) Receipts of Multipurpose Organizations.—Some organizations do not receive any funds which are to be expended solely for the purpose of attempting to influence legislation. Such organizations make such expenditures out of a general fund raised by dues, assessments, or other contributions. The percentage of the general fund which is used for such expenditures indicates the percentage of dues, assessments, or other contributions which may be considered to have been paid for that purpose. Therefore, in reporting receipts, such organizations may specify what that percentage is, and report their dues, assessments, and other contributions on that basis. However, each contributor of $500 or more is to be listed, regardless of whether the contribution was made solely for legislative purposes.

(c) IF THIS REPORT IS FOR AN AGENT OR EMPLOYEE.—(i) In General. In the case of many employees, all receipts will come under Items "D5" (received for services) and "D12" (expense money and reimbursements). In the absence of a clear statement to the contrary, it will be presumed that your employer is to reimburse you for all expenditures which you make in connection with legislative interests.

(ii) Employer as Contributor of $500 or More.—When your contribution from your employer (in the form of salary, fee, etc.) amounts to $500 or more, it is not necessary to report such contribution under "D13" and "D14," since the amount has already been reported under "D5," and the name of the "employer" has been given under Item "B" on page 1 of this report.

	QUARTER
P	1st	2d	3d	4th

NOTE ON ITEM "A".—(a) IN GENERAL. This "Report" form may be used by either an organization or an individual, as follows:

(i) "Employee".—To file as an "employee", state (in Item "B") the name, address, and nature of business of the "employer". (If the "employee" is a firm [such as a law firm or public relations firm], partners and salaried staff members of such firm may join in filing a Report as an "employee".)

(ii) "Employer".—To file as an "employer", write "None" in answer to Item "B".

(b) SEPARATE REPORTS. An agent or employee should not attempt to combine his Report with the employer's Report:

(i) Employers subject to the Act must file separate Reports and are not relieved of this requirement merely because Reports are filed by their agents or employees.

(ii) Employees subject to the Act must file separate Reports and are not relieved of this requirement merely because Reports are filed by their employers.

A. ORGANIZATION OR INDIVIDUAL FILING:

1. State name, address, and nature of business.

2. If this Report is for an Employer, list names or agents or employees who will file Reports for this Quarter.

NOTE ON ITEM "B".—Reports by Agents or Employees. An employee is to file, each quarter, as many Reports as he has employers, except that: (a) If a particular undertaking is jointly financed by a group of employers, the group is to be considered as one employer, but all members of the group are to be named, and the contribution of each member is to be specified; (b) if the work is done in the interest of one person but payment therefor is made by another, a single Report—naming both persons as "employers"—is to be filed each quarter.

B. EMPLOYER.—State name, address, and nature of business. If there is no employer, write "None."

NOTE ON ITEM "C".—(a) The expression "in connection with legislative interests," as used in this Report, means "in connection with attempting, directly or indirectly, to influence the passage or defeat of legislation." "The term 'legislation' means bills, resolutions, amendments, nominations, and other matters pending or proposed in either House of Congress, and includes any other matter which may be the subject of action by either House"—§ 302(e).

(c) After beginning such activities, they must file a "Quarterly" Report at the end of each calendar quarter in which they have either received or expended anything of value in connection with legislative interests.

C. LEGISLATIVE INTERESTS, AND PUBLICATIONS in connection therewith:

1. State approximately how long legislative interests are to continue. If receipts and expenditures in connection with legislative interests have terminated, ☐ place an "X" in the box at the left, so that this Office will no longer expect to receive Reports.

2. State the general legislative interests of the person filing and set forth the specific legislative interests by reciting: (a) Short titles of statutes and bills; (b) House and Senate numbers of bills, where known; (c) citations of statutes, where known; (d) whether for or against such statutes and bills.

3. In the case of those publications which the person filing has caused to be issued or distributed in connection with legislative interests, set forth: (a) Description, (b) quantity distributed; (c) date of distribution, (d) name of printer or publisher (if publications were paid for by person filing) or name of donor (if publications were received as a gift).

4. If this is a "Preliminary" Report (Registration) rather than a "Quarterly" Report, state below what the nature and amount of anticipated expenses will be; and if for an agent or employee, state also what the daily, monthly, or annual rate of compensation is to be. If this is a "Quarterly" Report, disregard this item "C4" and fill out item "D" and "E" on the back of this page. Do not attempt to combine a "Preliminary" Report (Registration) with a "Quarterly" Report.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father God, in a fateful hour, with such vast issues at stake, grant that those here who, by the people's choice, have been called to high places of state may maintain in themselves the fidelity of those who speak for a privileged nation to which much has been given and from which much will be required.

In all the words and actions in this Chamber, help them to remember that we are a part of the past, of the present, and of the future. We belong to all those who in the yesterdays condemned oppression and fought the good fight for freedom.

In the present we are the comrades of those who, across all frontiers and borders, and despising all shackles of the mind, however imposed, strive for the brotherhood of man under the fatherhood of God. And may we remember that we belong to the tomorrows as we live by a faith that sends a shining ray far down the future's broadening way. As by that faith we live, may those who here speak for America sow the seeds of a golden harvest for all mankind in a peaceful world that beckons. We ask it in the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

REPORT ON MUTUAL SECURITY PROGRAM—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT RECEIVED DURING ADJOURNMENT (H. DOC. NO. 231)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was received by the Secretary of the Senate on October 20, 1959, during the sine die adjournment of the Senate, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

Transmitted herewith is the 15th semiannual report on the operations of the mutual security program for the period ending December 31, 1958. The report was prepared by the coordinator of the mutual security program, with participation by the Department of State (including the International Cooperation Administration), the Department of Defense and the Development Loan Fund.

The essence of our experience during the 7½ years of the program on which reports have been transmitted to the Congress, is that the mutual security system is vital to our national security. If we do not persist in the continuous and vigorous application of military, economic, and technical programs making up the mutual security system, our foreign policy will be rendered ineffective. This ultimately cannot fail to have the most serious consequences for every living American.

If we fail to win the contest in which we are now engaged, the potential destruction of our way of life becomes, by the degree of our failure, more and more a dangerous reality. It behooves us all to keep this peril fresh in our minds.

I trust that this report will provide a yardstick to evaluate the measures we and other members of the great community of nations are taking in the mutual security program to defend our freedoms.

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

DEATH OF MRS. STROM THURMOND

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, every Member of this body was deeply saddened on yesterday to hear the tragic news of the passing of the young and beautiful wife of our friend and colleague, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND].

During the period it has been my privilege to serve as a Member of the Senate, I have known no person who was a part of the life of this body whose death has caused more distress and grief.

Mrs. Thurmond's cheery smile and unfailing good nature made her universally known and loved by everyone from the highest officials of Government to the policemen and elevator operators.

My personal friendship with Jean Thurmond was one of the most valued rewards of my Senate service, and I feel a deep sense of personal loss in her passing.

My heart goes out to Senator THURMOND and members of their family in the tragic loss they have sustained. I know that every Member of the Senate joins me in expressing condolences in the passing of one whom many loved so dearly.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, the untimely death yesterday of the lovely and charming wife of the distinguished junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND] has filled with sadness and grief the hearts of all those who knew her and cherished her friendship.

Jean Thufmond was one of the most gracious, intelligent, and accomplished women it has been my privilege to call my friend. She was a loving and devoted wife, an ever-present and dedicated helpmeet to her husband, a true and loyal friend to her vast realm of acquaintances and admirers, and a devout and practicing Christian whose unselfishness in serving the needs of others earned her the love and respect of all with whom she came into contact.

Senator THURMOND, the State of South Carolina, and the Nation have suffered a great loss. And as I rise today to express my deepest heartfelt sympathy to her husband, her loved ones, and her fellow South Carolinians, I take comfort in the fact that though her departure from this world has made it poorer Heaven is today richer for her presence there.

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, having learned of the tragedy which has come into the life of our colleague, the distinguished junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND], I wish to offer the sympathy of Mrs. Gruening and myself, which was expressed yesterday in the following telegram:

Dorothy and I are terribly shocked and deeply dismayed by the tragedy which has befallen you, remembering so well, from our days together as Governors, the loveliness and charm of your beautiful young wife, who has graced so many occasions since your coming to the Senate. We are appalled at the thought that she is no longer with us. Our very deepest and most heartfelt sympathy go out to you.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I express my personal sympathy to our colleague, the distinguished junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND] in the loss of his beloved and gracious wife.

Jean Thurmond was one of the loveliest women I have ever been privileged to know. Although words are inadequate at such a time, I am sure that all of us have a deep feeling of sympathy for our colleague.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, the distinguished junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. TALMADGE] has paid a merited tribute to the departed wife of our colleague, the able junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND]. The entire Senate has been saddened by the tragic word of the passing away of Mrs. Thurmond on yesterday, on the eve of the convening of this momentous session.

Mrs. Thurmond's grace, her unfailing courtesy to all, her uniform pleasantness, and her whole-souled devotion to her husband in all his activities have been remarked about time after time by Members of this body. In STROM THURMOND'S most difficult battles, she was by his side; and when he was on the floor of the Senate, engaged in sharp debate, she was his watchful and careful listener in the family section of the Senate galleries.

I join with my colleagues in extending our deepest sympathy to the bereaved husband, our colleague, the distinguished junior Senator from South Carolina. The entire Senate has lost from the ranks of the Senate families one of their most charming members. The vacant spot left in the Senate family gallery will not be vacant for STROM THURMOND alone, but for the entire Senate, and for all of us who had observed Mrs. Thurmond and her devotion to her husband, his work, and this body as an institution.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I was saddened, as were all of us, by news of the death of the wife of our colleague and friend, Senator STROM THURMOND. All of us came to know quickly the great qualities of Jean Thurmond. She was kind, congenial, and intelligent, and it was easy to see that her attributes emanated from deep religious beliefs and a noble character.

We saw here the devotion and love of Senator THURMOND and Mrs. Thurmond for each other. We know that there is nothing we can say that can bring him solace, but I am certain that the life and memory of Jean Thurmond will bring him comfort in the years that are ahead.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I wish the RECORD to show that my wife and I together with Senators and their families on both sides of the aisle, send to STROM THURMOND, a Member of the Senate from South Carolina, our profound condolences on his very great and very grievous loss.

Many times, Mr. President, the Senate has been called a club. To an extent, I think that is true; but the Senate and the Senators and their families together might be called a family—at least, as I see it—and when a sweet and lovely woman, the wife of a Member of the Senate family, was taken, it was an occasion for very great sorrow, not alone by the Thurmond family, but by all Members of the Senate.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I wish to join my distinguished colleague, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], the minority whip, the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL], and other Senators who on this floor have expressed their sorrow at the passing of Jean Thurmond, the wife of the Senator from South Carolina.

When I came into the Chamber yesterday I looked up at the family gallery. Jean Thurmond was always to be seen in that part of the Senate galleries. Yesterday she was missing. Later, of course, word came that she had passed away. The delicate operation which had been performed on her some months ago had been unsuccessful.

I wish at this time, on behalf of Mrs. Mansfield and myself, to extend to Senator THURMOND our deepest sympathy in his hour of great sorrow and stress. I know that by the untimely death of Jean Thurmond he has lost a partner who will be missed greatly.

May her soul rest in peace.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Petitions, etc., were laid before the Senate, or presented, and referred as indicated:

By the VICE PRESIDENT:

Two joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin; to the Committee on Finance:

"JOINT RESOLUTION 51, A

"Joint resolution memorializing Congress to oppose legislation prescribing any minimum interest rate or any maximum maturity dates for securities issued by cooperatives in payment of patronage savings payable to their patrons

"Whereas business enterprises are made up of several types of business organizations, including proprietorships, partnerships, corporations and cooperatives, all of which contribute greatly to the tempo of economic activity within the State; and

"Whereas Wisconsin is one of the leading cooperative States of the Nation, and particularly within the rural areas cooperatives have greatly benefited and rendered service to their members; and

"Whereas the tax position of cooperatives has been thoroughly investigated by the Congress of the United States over a long period of time and these investigations have revealed that under the present laws, the cooperatives have faithfully abided by the principles and regulations under which they have been organized; and

"Whereas cooperatives do pay taxes and in many communities of this State are the largest taxpayers; and

"Whereas the Secretary of the Treasury has recommended to Congress to require cooperative patronage savings to be paid in cash within 3 years and to draw not less than 4 percent interest, or otherwise to be classified as income to the cooperative and be thereby subjected to corporation income taxes; and

"Whereas this alteration of the present tax status would seriously hamper and restrict the services which the cooperatives are performing within the State: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States is requested to recognize that indebtedness which is owed by a cooperative or any other taxpayer to its patrons or customers is not income to such taxpayer even though it may be income to its patrons or customers; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Congress of the United States be specifically requested to oppose any measures which would prescribe any minimum interest rate or any maximum maturity dates for securities which are issued by cooperatives in payment of patronage savings payable to their patrons; and be it further

"Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury, the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to each Member of Congress from the State of Wisconsin.

"PHILEO NASH,
"President of the Senate.
"GEORGE MOLINARO,
"Speaker of the Assembly."

"JOINT RESOLUTION 32, A

"Joint resolution memorializing Congress to take steps to restrict the importation of veneer to compete with our lumber industry

"Whereas the wood veneer industry has long been one of the leading industries in Wisconsin; and

"Whereas a good portion of Wisconsin's population derives its sole income from the processing of wood products; and

"Whereas similar wood products from foreign countries are able to compete in the American market because shipping costs are offset by lower labor costs; and

"Whereas this unfair competition has seriously depressed the important veneer industry resulting in widespread unemployment among the people within and dependent upon the industry: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the assembly, the senate concurring, That the legislature urge the Congress of the United States to give consideration to this problem and to take steps to reduce the foreign competition in the veneer industry; and, be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be submitted to the Honorable Dwight D. Eisenhower, President of the United States, the Secretary of the United States Senate, the Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives, and each member of the Wisconsin delegation in Congress.

"PHILEO NASH,
"President of the Senate.
"GEORGE MOLINARO,
"Speaker of the Assembly."

A resolution of the House of Representatives of the State of Wisconsin; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

"RESOLUTION 28, A

"Resolution relating to memorializing Congress regarding dairy products price supports

"Whereas the purchasing power of milk has been reduced considerably below the level prevailing in 1952 as a consequence of actions by the Secretary of Agriculture since he took office; and

"Whereas President Eisenhower and Secretary of Agriculture Benson have recommended further reductions in the minimum price support rate for manufacturing milk to only 60 percent of parity, which would reduce the minimum price support protection to a national average of only $2.40 per hundred pounds, thus making possible a total reduction in milk purchasing power since 1952 of 42 percent; and

"Whereas the total net income of the farmers of Wisconsin has dropped from $3,380 per farm in 1952 to $2,793 per farm in 1958 or a total of 18 percent in 7 years, and milk prices are declining further this year while production costs have been and are mounting steadily; and

"Whereas the surplus inventories of dairy products held by the Commodity Credit Corporation have increased by almost 7½ times in the 6 years, from $8.5 million on December 31, 1952, to $62.5 million on December 31, 1958; and

"Whereas costs and losses to the Federal Government on price support operations for dairy products have mounted to more than 11 times as much during the 6 years of Secretary Benson's term of office as the entire total of all such costs and losses during the 20 preceding years, totaling $1 billion 512 million ($1,512,000,000) in the years 1953 through 1958 as contrasted with only $131 million for the 20-year period 1933 through December 31, 1952; and

"Whereas this severe and unjustified cut in farm income has imposed serious hardships upon farmers and their families, forcing many to sacrifice their investments in farming enterprises and the skills and experience gained over their entire lifetimes and to seek employment in urban occupations already suffering from recurrent and still serious unemployment problems; and

"Whereas the depression thus created on the farms has spread into the small towns and cities and even to major industrial centers which depend upon the farm market for their products and services; and

"Whereas the rural depression severely sharpens the fiscal difficulties encountered by local governments in their efforts to maintain and improve schools, highways, welfare institutions; and other essential public services; and

"Whereas the policy recommended by President Eisenhower and Secretary Benson of imposing further reductions in farm prices and farmers' incomes will severely aggravate all of these serious wrongs and difficulties rather than contribute toward their correction, and will if continued result in the destruction of our farming system of family-sized independently operated free enterprises: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Assembly of the State of Wisconsin does hereby petition the Congress of the United States to reject the recommendations of President Eisenhower and Secretary of Agriculture Benson; and, be it further

"Resolved, That the Assembly of the State of Wisconsin memorialize the Congress of the United States to enact legislation which would require the United States Secretary of Agriculture to increase the price support of manufactured milk to at least $3.50 per hundredweight, which would be somewhat more in line with the present high cost of production and the inflated cost of living, until such time as Congress may adopt a program which will give dairy farmers full parity of income; and, be it further

"Resolved, That the Congress of the United States initiate a thorough investigation of operations of the Department of Agriculture during the past 6 years with a view to determining responsibility for and correcting the mismanagement and faulty policies which have resulted in the highest expenditures by the Department in all history in the face of severe and worsening depression conditions for farmers; and, be it further

"Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be sent to the Secretary of the U.S. Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, to each Wisconsin Member of Congress, to the Secretary of Agriculture, to the minority and majority leaders of both Houses of Congress and to the Honorable Dwight D. Eisenhower, President of the United States.

"GEORGE MOLINARO,
"Speaker of the Assembly.
"NORMAN C. ANDERSON,
"Chief Clerk of the Assembly."

A joint resolution of the legislature of the State of Oregon; to the Committee on Appropriations:

"HOUSE JOINT MEMORIAL 1

"To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled:

"We, your memorialists, the Senate and the House of Representatives of the State of Oregon, in legislative session assembled, most respectfully represent and petition as follows:

"Whereas the findings of the Pacific Northwest Governors' Power Policy Committee and their engineering committee representing all generating agencies, both Federal and local, show that power use in the region will increase 6,400,000 kilowatts by 1964, requiring the expenditure of approximately $2 billion on the construction of new electrical facilities, at the rate of more than $200 million per year over the next 10 years; and

"Whereas the people of the State of Oregon and of the Pacific Northwest region as a whole depend primarily upon the utilization of falling water for their supply of electric power; and

"Whereas the Federal Government, through its construction of multiple-purpose river projects, has become a major supplier of electric power to the region; and

"Whereas it is of utmost importance to the Pacific Northwest that the Federal projects now under construction in the region be kept on schedule so that the estimated firm load requirements can at least be met until 1960; and

"Whereas the McNary, Chief Joseph, and The Dalles projects, when completed, will have a combined generating capacity exceeding 3 million kilowatts; and

"Whereas it is of vital importance to maintain these Federal projects on a full construction schedule: Now, therefore be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Oregon (the Senate jointly concurring therein), That the Congress of the United States be and it hereby is memorialized to give full recognition to the responsibilities of the Federal Government to make funds available for the completion on schedule of the Chief Joseph, McNary, and The Dalles projects now under construction, upon which the Pacific Northwest unavoidably must rely for its growth requirements during the next 5 years; be it further

"Resolved, That the secretary of state of the State of Oregon be and hereby is directed to send a copy of this memorial to the President of the United States, to the President and Chief Clerk of the U.S. Senate, to the Speaker and the Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to each Member of the Congress.

"Adopted by house January 13, 1955.

"E. A. GEARY,
"Speaker of House.

"Adopted by senate January 20, 1955.

"President of Senate."

A resolution of the Senate of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts; to the Committee on Public Works:

"RESOLUTIONS RELATIVE TO THE LOCATION OF THE PROPOSED GOVERNMENT CENTER IN THE CITY OF BOSTON

"Whereas the tax rate of the city of Boston is a matter of grave concern; and

"Whereas the financial condition of the city is precarious; and

"Whereas the provisions of General Laws, chapter 121, sections 26JJ and 26KK, as amended, apply specifically only to substandard, decadent and blighted open areas; and

"Whereas the provisions of General Laws, chapter 121, section 24B, forbid the sale to the Federal Government of land below cost; and

"Whereas the mayor of the city of Boston and the Boston Redevelopment Authority have entered into an agreement contrary to the intent and purpose of the foregoing statutes, whereby it is proposed that the city of Boston in cooperation with the Boston Redevelopment Authority shall, at a cost approximating $4 million for eminent domain proceedings, and at an additional estimated cost of $1 million for razing the structures, and at an additional estimated cost of one-half million dollars for construction of streets, sewers and utilities, making a total estimated cost of $5,500,000, destroy good and valuable taxable property; and

"Whereas the city of Boston is to receive under this proposed plan in exchange for valuable taxable land and office buildings, bank buildings, Kirstein Memorial Library, and other valuable taxable property between Court, School and Washington Streets, only $650,000 in cash, and a piece of vacant land reportedly appraised at $850,000, making a loss to the city of Boston of $4 million, together with an annual loss to the city of at least $350,000 in taxes; and

"Whereas this proposed plan, if carried out in conjunction with a proposal for the elimination of other taxable real estate, will result in the total elimination of a reported $17 million of taxable property, or approximately a loss of income to the city of Boston of approximately $1,700,000 annually; and

"Whereas the original site chosen in Scollay, Bowdoin, Adams and Dock Squares for the total redevelopment project comprising the Federal, State and city office buildings, was chosen after a 6-months' study by the city planning board, experts and consultants, which site could be fairly described as a 'decadent, blighted and substandard area;' and

"Whereas no legal or practical objection can be made to the location as originally contemplated; and

"Whereas the mayor and the redevelopment authority place the responsibility for the new Washington Street location for the proposed Federal Building on Franklin Floete, Administrator of the General Services Administration; and

"Whereas said Floete denies this fact and has stated in writing over his signature, on August 18, 1959, that '* * * the site in question was proposed to us by the municipal authorities of Boston and the Boston Redevelopment Authority, and that any complaints about the Washington Street location should be addressed to that authority;' and

"Whereas the Boston Real Estate Board has voted that all means be adopted to shift the new proposed site back to the location in the Scollay Square area as originally contemplated by all concerned; therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Massachusetts Senate favors the building of a new government center, including a new Federal building, in the site originally contemplated: to wit, the Scollay, Bowdoin, Dock and Adams Square area; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent forthwith by the secretary of the commonwealth to the mayor of the city of Boston, the Boston City Council, the State housing authority, and the Boston Redevelopment Authority, the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Massachusetts, and Franklin Floete, Administrator of the General Services Administration.

"Senate, adopted, September 9, 1959.

"Clerk.

"Attest:

"JOSEPH D. WARD,
"Secretary of the Commonwealth."

A resolution of the House of Representatives of the State of Pennsylvania; to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

"In 1800, the infant Federal Government moved its permanent capital in Washington, D.C., but Maryland and Virginia in completing the cession of the District of Columbia failed to make any provision to protect the voting rights of residents occupying the ceded area. A reasonable assumption is that the state through Congress would provide some method of voting.

"Our Nation's Capital, Washington, D.C., is unquestionably the home and symbol of the ideal of American representative democracy, yet 831,000 citizens in the Nation's Capital are denied the right to vote for the people they want to represent them—a population greater than that of any one of 12 States.

"There is no 'local' government in the District of Columbia. Local laws are passed by Congress and signed by the President. Congress must approve every cent of local expenditures. The municipal government is an agency of Congress. A number of other Federal bureaus, departments, and agencies have certain functions in the government of the area.

"Since the people of the District of Columbia have no vote, and if taxation without representation is tyranny, then it exists in the Capital of this great land. In addition, it is questionable whether the Congressmen are very conscious of the needs of the people of the District of Columbia since they must first represent their own districts and second, they have thousands of problems relating to the Nation as a whole and the world.

"Originally, this system might have worked if the District of Columbia contained nothing but government buildings and institutions. However, as a result of the great influx of population, Congress must legislate in such matters as zoning, streets, parking, and other services. Again the need for a local government in the District is very evident.

"While thousands of words are heard relating to the sanctity of the right to vote in America in connection with the civil rights debates, the most wholesale voting discrimination in this country is ignored.

"We, the people of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, are strongly in favor of home rule. We believe that Congress should give this right to the people of the District of Columbia: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania memoralize the Congress of the United States to support and enact legislation to give the people of the District of Columbia the right to elect the officials to administer their local affairs, to vote in presidential elections, and to have voting representation in the Congress of the United States; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the presiding officers of each House of the Congress of the United States.

"Speaker, House of Representatives,
"JOSEPH OMINSKY,
"Chief Clerk, House of Representatives."

A resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island; to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

"RESOLUTION REQUESTING THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES AND CONGRESS TO ESTABLISH PERMANENT DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND THE VATICAN STATE

"Whereas the President of the United States will meet with Pope John XXIII at the Vatican in Rome on December 6, 1959; and

"Whereas the United States now has more than 39 million Catholics comprising about 22 percent of the population; and

"Whereas the Vatican State, aptly referred to as the central information agency of the world, and numerous world powers already enjoy mutual diplomatic relations, a desirable and accepted means of communication between the Vatican and these nations; and

"Whereas the United States and the Vatican are the undisputed leaders in a joint effort to attain world peace and to alleviate the plight of legions of oppressed peoples of the world.

"Resolved, That the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island respectfully requests the President of the United States to initiate earnest discussions with Pope John XXIII recommending the establishment of permanent diplomatic relations between the United States and the Vatican State whereby the mutual aims and objectives of both powers toward the preservation of the free world may be better attained; directing the secretary of state to transmit a duly certified copy of this resolution to the President of the United States, to the Presiding Officers of both Houses in the Congress of the United States with the request that this resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations in each branch of the Congress for consideration at the next session of Congress, and to the Senators and Representatives from Rhode Island in said Congress.

"Secretary of State."

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Mississippi; to the Committee on the Judiciary:

"SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION I

"Concurrent resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to propose an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to balancing the expenditures and the income of the Government of the United States

"Whereas the U.S. Government is presently indebted in a minimum sum of $295 billion and the debt increases each year; and

"Whereas the U.S. Government now has to pay approximately $9 billion in interest on the present indebtedness each fiscal year and has now ordinarily to auction off its bonds as the smallest municipality would have to do and the cost of borrowing money continues to increase to the detriment of the U.S. Government, private enterprise and the individual taxpayer; and

"Whereas the value of a dollar continues to decrease, particularly since World War II, largely due to the inflationary fiscal policy of the Government not only for the Armed Forces, to which no objection is made, but in foreign aid and giveaway programs and tremendous expenditures at home in the civil department of the Government; and

"Whereas the people of Mississippi, as well as the other 49 States; are already bearing a practically confiscatory and excessive burden of taxes particularly from the United States Government; and

"Whereas the basic weapon of communism is to tempt our Government to spend itself into bankruptcy and many activities of the Government are in direct competition with private enterprise; and

"Whereas 'the power to tax is the power to destroy,' and the present level of taxation on the people of Mississippi and the remainder States has reached the point of diminishing returns; and

"Whereas even under President Eisenhower who ran in 1952 under a program of economy, the expenditures of the Government continue to increase year by year in peacetime; and

"Whereas not only is the Federal Government courting bankruptcy but the rights of the States are being day by day endangered by the intrusion of the Federal Government in the fields exclusively reserved to the States under the 10th amendment: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Mississippi State Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring therein), That we respectfully urge and memoralize the Congress of the United States to propose to the States an amendment to the Constitution of the United States as provided by article V of the Constitution, which amendment should read as follows, to wit:

" 'SECTION 1. On or before the 15th day after the beginning of each regular session of the Congress, the President shall transmit to the Congress a budget which shall set forth his estimate of the receipts of the Government, other than trust funds, during the ensuing fiscal year under the laws then existing and his recommendations with respect to expenditures to be made from funds other than trust funds during such ensuing fiscal year, which shall not exceed such estimate of the receipts. The President in transmitting such budget may recommend measures for raising additional revenue and his recommendations for the expenditure of such additional revenue. If the Congress shall authorize expenditures to be made during such ensuing fiscal year in excess of such estimate of the receipts, it shall not adjourn for more than 3 days at a time until such action has been taken as may be necessary to balance the budget for such ensuing fiscal year. In case of war or other grave national emergency, if the President shall so recommend, the Congress by a vote of three-fourths of all the Members of each House may suspend the foregoing provisions for balancing the budget for periods, either successive or otherwise, not exceeding 1 year each.

" 'SEC. 2. This article shall take effect on the first day of the calendar year next following the ratification of this article.

" 'SEC. 3. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within 7 years from the date of its submission to the States by the Congress'; be it further "Resolved, That a certified copy of this resolution be forwarded by the secretary of state to the President of the U.S. Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Member of Congress from the State of Mississippi.

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Hawaii; to the Committee on Armed Services:

"HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 16

"Concurrent resolution requesting the President and the Congress of the United States and the Secretary of Defense to provide for a satellite launching base on the island of Hawaii

"Whereas plans for a satellite base have been submitted to Federal defense and space authorities by Parsons Engineering Co. of Los Angeles; and

"Whereas the location of the island of Hawaii is particularly suited for directing satellites into polar orbits which would greatly aid in discovering the crucial keys to manned space travel; and

"Whereas Mount Mauna Kea on the island of Hawaii would offer the distinct advantages of: (1) Permitting satellite firings north, south, or east over open water and thus reduce the hazards connected with such firings and allow easier recoveries of failures and boosters; (2) utilizing a remote and isolated area which is close enough to the port and services of Hilo; and (3) taking advantage of the high altitude of Mount Mauna Kea which would permit scientists to lift bigger packages of instruments off into space; and

"Whereas such a satellite launching station would be of inestimable value to the United States of America and to the State of Hawaii: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the First Legislature of the State of Hawaii in special session assembled (the Senate concurring), That the President and Congress of the United States and the Secretary of Defense be respectfully requested to authorize the erection of a satellite launching station on the island of Hawaii;" and be it further

"Resolved, That certified copies of this concurrent resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, the Secretary of Defense, Congressman DANIEL K. INOUYE, Senator OREN E. LONG, Senator HIRAM L. FONG, and the Parsons Engineering Co., of Los Angeles.

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Hawaii; to the Committee on Finance:

"HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 20

"Resolution requesting the President and Congress of the United States to extend the expiration date for World War II veterans' home loans

"Whereas World War II veterans' home loans which are guaranteed up to 60 percent by the Veterans' Administration of the Federal Government expire on July 26, 1960; and

"Whereas Congress has seen fit to amend the veterans' home loan law, Public Law 85–857 (38 U.S.C.A., sec. 1803, 72 Stat. 1205), in this present session of Congress by increasing the interest rates payable thereunder to make such loans easier to finance by veterans; and

"Whereas the Legislature of the State of Hawaii is desirous of issuing bonds in the amount of $20 million for the purchasing of veterans' mortagages for the benefit of all of its veterans; and

"Whereas under the present wording of section 3 of article VI of the State constitution, the issuance of such bonds would jeopardize the funded debt limit of the State of Hawaii and thus prevent the first State legislature from issuing bonds; and

"Whereas statistics show that only 13 percent of Hawaii's war veterans have been able to participate in such loans as compared to 28 percent in the Continental United States; and

"Whereas more of Hawaii's war veterans would be able to participate in such home loans if the date of expiration was extended by Congress; and

"Whereas such a bond issue would be of tremendous benefit to the veterans and the economy of the State of Hawaii and the United States; Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the First State Legislature of the State of Hawaii in special session assembled (the Senate concurring), That the President and the Congress of the United States be respectfully requested to amend Public Law 85–857, September 2, 1958 (38 U.S.C.A., sec. 1803, 72 Stat. 1205) as amended, by extending the date of the expiration of World War II veterans' home loans; and be it further

"Resolved, That certified copies of this concurrent resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, Congressman DANIEL K. INOUYE, Senator OREN E. LONG, Senator HIRAM L. FONG, the United Veterans' Legislative Committee, U.S. Filipino Veterans, Inc., American Legion, Club 100, Disabled American Veterans, 442nd Club, Hawaii Filipino Vets Club, Military Intelligence Service, Reserve Officers Association, 1399th Club, Spanish-American War Veterans, Veterans of Foreign Wars, and AMVETS, World War I, Barracks No. 447.

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Hawaii; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs:

"HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 29

"Whereas the seven islands of American Samoa, containing 76 square miles of land, with a population of 23,000 persons, have been a possession of the United States for 59 years; and

"Whereas American Samoa is administered by a Governor appointed by the President of the United States, who makes the laws and administers them, while the Legislature of American Samoa, composed of a senate and house of representatives, has only advisory powers; and

"Whereas, last spring, the Legislature of American Samoa adopted a resolution urging the Congress of the United States to pass an organic act authorizing the establishment of a democratic government for American Samoa; and

"Whereas the people of the State of Hawaii believe that the right of franchise and self-determination should be granted to all peoples and believe further that the people of American Samoa now are fully capable of legislating for themselves: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the First Legislature of the State of Hawaii, special session of 1959 (the Senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States is hereby respectfully requested to grant to the people of American Samoa the right to legislate for themselves; and be it further

"Resolved, That duly authenticated copies of this concurrent resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, the Members representing the State of Hawaii in the Congress of the United States, the Governor of the State of Hawaii, the Lieutenant Governor of the State of Hawaii, the Governor of American Samoa, and the president of the senate and the speaker of the house of representatives of the legislature of American Samoa.

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Hawaii; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service:

"Whereas the wage rates paid the 'blue-collar' workers in the employ of the Government of the United States are determined through the process known as a 'wage survey,' the legal basis for which is the act of July 16, 1862; and

"Whereas the key factor in these area wage surveys is that of comparability in that the company or industry surveyed shall be comparable in scope or function with that of naval shipyards within the locality and that the particular crafts surveyed shall be comparable to similar crafts in the shipyard with respect to the job duties performed; and

"Whereas the State of Hawaii is basically an agricultural community and further, that there is a marked lack of industries or companies or jobs within such private industries or companies which are comparable to those of the naval shipyard in the Oahu labor market area to warrant the expense of thousands of dollars to conduct such surveys; and

"Whereas the setting of wage rates for thousands of such blue-collar workers based upon data collected on just a handful of comparable occupations is definitely unfair to such workers employed in the State of Hawaii by the Federal Government: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the First Legislature of the State of Hawaii, special session of 1959 (the Senate concurring), That the Legislature of the State of Hawaii request, and it hereby does request the President and the Congress of the United States to enact such laws, rules, orders, and regulations granting to the Federal civil service blue-collar workers the same hourly rates of pay as are paid to employees of similar classifications resulting from area wage survey applicable to employees of the San Francisco Naval Shipyard in our sister State of California; and be it further

"Resolved, That duly authenticated copies of this concurrent resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, the leaders in the U.S. Congress, the Secretaries of Defense, Navy, Army, and Air Force, to our Senators and Representatives to the U.S. Congress, to the Leadingmen's and Quartermen's Association, Pearl Harbor Naval Shipyard, and to the heads of all labor unions within the State of Hawaii.

Two concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Hawaii; to the Committee on Public Works:

"HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 33

"Whereas revenues realized from Federal fuel taxes are appropriated for Federal contributions and subsidies for highway systems in the United States; and

"Whereas appropriations for Federal contributions and subsidies for highway systems in the United States are distributed pursuant to the provisions of title 23 of the United States Code; and

"Whereas the ultimate purpose of the said title 23 is to promote intrastate and interstate commerce and national and civil defense; and

"Whereas Hawaii, as a Territory, was not included with the various States insofar as the provisions of the said title 23 relating to Federal contributions and subsidies for a national system of interstate and defense highways were concerned, despite the fact that its people were subjected to the same Federal fuel taxes as were the people of the various States; and

"Whereas the Highway Appropriations Act recently passed by the 86th Congress of the United States provides in part that:

" 'The Secretary of Commerce is authorized and directed to make a study of the need for extension of the National System of Interstate and Defense Highways within the States of Alaska and Hawaii and report the results of such study to the Congress within 10 days subsequent to January 4, 1960'; and

"Whereas the establishment of a highway system connecting all of the communities within any State would promote intrastate and interstate commerce and national and civil defense; and

"Whereas there is no highway system connecting all of the communities within the State of Hawaii; and

"Whereas a highway system consisting of roads connecting all of the communities in the State of Hawaii is physically impossible because Hawaii 'consists of the most beautiful fleet of islands that lie anchored in any ocean'; and

"Whereas the Federal Government has considered bridges spanning bodies of water, tunnels running beneath bodies of water and the routes of ferries operating over bodies of water as parts of the highway systems of various continental States pursuant to the provisions of the said title 23; and

"Whereas the most feasible method of establishing a highway system connecting all of the communities within the State of Hawaii would involve the establishment of an interisland ferry system; and

"Whereas an interisland ferry system connecting the various islands comprising the State of Hawaii would be a part of its highway system in the fullest and truest sense of the term: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the First Legislature of the State of Hawaii, first special session of 1959 (the Senate concurring), That the Commissioner of Public Roads of the United States, the Federal Highway Administrator of the United States, the Secretary of Commerce of the United States, the President of the United States, the Public Works Committee of the Senate of the United States and the 86th Congress of the United States be respectively requested to give favorable consideration to:

"1. Include the State of Hawaii with the other States insofar as the provisions of title 23 of the United States Code relating to a National System of Interstate and Defense Highways are concerned;

"2. Allow the State of Hawaii credit for Federal fuel taxes paid by its people during the period when Hawaii was a Territory and was excluded from the provisions of the said title 23 relating to a National System of Interstate and Defense Highways insofar as future Federal contributions to or subsidies for highways are concerned; and

"3. Include interisland ferry systems connecting the islands comprising the State of Hawaii as a part of its highway system insofar as the provisions of the said title 23 are concerned; and be it further

"Resolved, That duly authenticated copies of this concurrent resolution be forwarded to the Commissioner of Public Roads of the United States, the Federal Highway Administration of the United States, the Secretary of Commerce of the United States, the President of the United States, the Public Works Committee of the Senate of the 86th Congress of the United States, U.S. Senator HIRAM L. FONG, U.S. Senator OREN E. LONG, U.S. Congressman DANIEL K. INOUYE, the President of the U.S. Senate and the Speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives.

"CONCURRENT RESOLUTION

"Whereas the citizens of the new State of Hawaii like the rest of the citizens of the great country of ours, pay Federal excise and fuel taxes; and

"Whereas Hawaii and Alaska, unlike the rest of the States are excluded from the benefits of the National System of Interstate and Defense Highways; and

"Whereas Hawaii has paid more than $2 million in fuel and excise taxes than it received in Federal highway aid during the past year; and

"Whereas it is anticipated that Hawaii will be paying more than $3,250,000 during the coming year in Federal fuel and excise taxes than it will be receiving in such highway aid; and

"Whereas this inequitable taxation is further intensified by the fact that some of our larger military bases throughout the State continue to use our existing highways established some 30 years ago without being able to contribute toward the improvement and maintenance thereof; and

"Whereas a tremendous need exists for the construction and improvement of highways in Hawaii to meet the demands of a rapidly expanding population and the demands of the Armed Forces of the United States for a better integrated defense highway system; and

"Whereas by the provisions of section 105 of the Federal Aid Highway Act of 1959, the Secretary of Commerce was authorized and directed to make a study of the need for the extension of the National System of Interstate and Defense Highways within the State of Hawaii; and

"Whereas the Commissioner of Public Roads was designated to study this matter so that a report can be submitted to the Congress of the United States before January 14, 1960; and

"Whereas the State of Hawaii will be represented at a hearing to be held before the Commissioner during the week of October 12 to 16, 1959, for the purpose of determining whether Hawaii should be included in the Federal Interstate and Defense Highway Act: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate of the First Legislature of the State of Hawaii, special session of 1959 (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of Commerce of the United States report favorably to the Congress of the United States that the National Systems of Interstate and Defense Highways be extended to Hawaii at the earliest possible date; and be it further

"Resolved, That duly certified copies of this concurrent resolution be transmitted to the Secretary of the Department of Commerce; the Commissioner of Public Roads; the delegates to the National Conference of the American Association of State Highway Officials; the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States; the Honorable OREN E. HOUSE RESOLUTION 106

"Whereas the new State of Hawaii is rapidly becoming one of the greatest tourist centers of the world and the leading gateway to Pacific Ocean travel; and

"Whereas Waikiki is universally famous as a beach and recreation area, and is a focal point of interest for visitors and local residents alike; and

"Whereas the expansion of tourism and the growth of the State's population has created a sharp need for additional sites for tourist accommodations and for more recreational and beach areas, particularly around the Waikiki vicinity; and

"Whereas the Fort De Russy Military Reservation, situated in the Waikiki area and extending from Kalakaua Avenue in said Waikiki makai to the sea, with a frontage on said Kalakaua Avenue of 772.86 feet, and a frontage on the sea, along the mean high tide line, of 1,769.5 feet, comprising a total of approximately 71.982 acres, is most suitable to meet said need; and

"Whereas it has always been the established policy of the State of Hawaii, in the interest of the general public, to establish park and recreation areas wherever possible on beaches at such intervals as will permit the public to enjoy the use of said beaches; and

"Whereas there are not now located on any portion of Fort De Russy Military Reservation any military installations essential to national security, either now or in the foreseeable future: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the First Legislature of the State of Hawaii, special session of 1959, That the Honorable HIRAM L. FONG and the Honorable OREN E. LONG, U.S. Senators from Hawaii; the Honorable DANIEL K. INOUYE, U.S. Representative from Hawaii; and the Governor of Hawaii be, and they are hereby requested to use their best efforts to obtain for the State of Hawaii as much land in the Fort De Russy Military Reservation as possible, including beach areas, being mindful of the recreational needs of the military in this area, in order that the same may be used by the State of Hawaii for the creation of tourist accommodations and beach park and recreation facilities and for public rights of way to the sea, all in the interest of the visitors to and people of the State of Hawaii; and be it further

"Resolved, That duly certified copies of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States; the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States; the Honorable HIRAM L. FONG and the Honorable OREN E. LONG, U.S. Senators from Hawaii; the Honorable DANIEL K. INOUYE, U.S. Representative from Hawaii; the Governor of Hawaii; each Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the Senate and House of Representatives of the U.S. Congress; and the Secretary of Defense, the Secretary of the Army and the Secretary of the Department of the Interior of the United States.

A resolution of the Legislature of the Virgin Islands; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs:

"RESOLUTION 1016

"Resolution memoralizing the Congress of the United States to enact private legislation with respect to title to certain church properties in the Virgin Islands

"Whereas at the time of cession of the Danish West Indies to the United States in 1917, the convention between the United States and Denmark provided in article 1, in part, that there is ceded to the United States all territory, dominion, and sovereignty possessed by Denmark, and that 'This cession includes the right of property in all public, government, or crown lands, public buildings, wharves, ports, harbors, fortifications, barracks, public funds, rights, franchises, and privileges, and all other public property of every kind or description now belonging to Denmark together with all appurtenances thereto'; and

"Whereas article 2 of the said convention provided in pertinent part that 'It is understood that this cession does not in any respect impair private rights which by law belong to the peaceful possession of property of all kinds by private individuals of whatsoever nationality, by municipalities, public or private establishments, ecclesiastical or civic bodies, or any other associations having legal capacity to acquire and possess property in the islands ceded.

"'The congregations belonging to the Danish National Church shall retain the undisturbed use of the churches which are now used by them, together with the parsonages appertaining thereunto and other appurtenances, including the funds allotted to the churches'; and

"Whereas the U.S. Senate in giving its advice and consent to the ratification of the convention, did so on the condition that 'such advice and consent are given with the understanding, to be expressed as a part of the instrument of ratification, that such convention shall not be taken and construed by the high contracting parties as imposing any trust upon the United States with respect to any funds belonging to the Danish National Church in the Danish West Indian Islands, or in which the said church may have an interest, nor as imposing upon the United States any duty or responsibility with respect to the management of any property belonging to said church, beyond protecting said church in the possession and use of church property as stated in said convention, in the same manner and to the same extent only as other churches shall be protected in the possession and use of their several properties'; and

"Whereas the U.S. Senate, as a further condition to the ratification of the convention, specified that this particular matter be made the subject of an exchange of notes between the Governments of the United States and Denmark 'so as to make it plain that this condition is understood and accepted by the two Governments, the purpose hereof being to bring the said convention clearly within the constitutional powers of the United States with respect to church establishment and freedom of religion'; and

"Whereas the foregoing conditions were fulfilled by the exchange of formal notes between the two high contracting parties on January 3, 1917, and, thereafter, the said convention was duly ratified by both Governments and the ratifications exchanged in Washington, D.C., on January 17, 1917; and

"Whereas prior to the cession of the Virgin Islands to the United States, and on April 6, 1906, a Danish colonial law was proclaimed, section 51 of which stated 'The public buildings, and the real and movable property, including articles of inventory, etc., which serve for the purposes of the Government, the military force, and the congregations of the national church, are transferred to the ownership of the state treasury. In case of a dispute as to what, in accordance herewith, becomes the property of the state treasury, the question shall be decided by the King'; and

"Whereas at the request of the board of American missions of the United Lutheran Church in America, a religious organization having affiliations with certain congregations now using properties which might be affected by said law, the U.S. Embassy in Copenhagen in 1957 requested advice from the appropriate Danish authorities with respect to title to the properties, hereinafter described in more detail; and

"Whereas by a 'note verbale,' dated November 14, 1958, the Danish officials expressed the opinion that title to certain properties passed to the Danish Government in accordance with the above-quoted section 51 of the Danish Law of April 6, 1906, and, hence, that title to such properties passed to the United States at the time of the Cession of the Virgin Islands in 1917, subject, however, to the specific reservation that the churches were to retain the undisturbed use of such properties; and

"Whereas the properties which were the subject of said note verbale included the following:

"(1) Church property, 7 Norre Gade (including No. 34 Kongens Gade) in King's Quarter in the Town of Charlotte Amalie on the Island of Saint Thomas, Virgin Islands, of U.S.A., appearing in the Surveyor's Records for the Town of Charlotte Amalie, Book I, Folio 4, Survey of December 15, 1836;

"(2) Parsonage property, 23 Kongens Gade, in the King's Quarter in the Town of Charlotte Amalie on the Island of St. Thomas, Virgin Islands of U.S.A., appearing in the Surveyor's Records for the Town of Charlotte Amalie, Book I, Folio 52, Survey of March 25, 1843;

"(3) Church property, No. 4 King Street in the Town of Christiansted, on the Island of St. Croix, Virgin Islands, according to the Public Surveyor's Records;

"(4) Parsonage property, No. 51 King Street in the Town of Christiansted, on the Island of St. Croix, Virgin Islands, according to the Public Surveyor's Records;

"(5) Church Property, Nos. 11, 12, 13 & 14 Hospital Street in the Town of Frederiksted, on the Island of St. Croix, Virgin Islands, according to the Public Surveyor's Records; and

"Whereas each of said properties is now being used as church property, and has been so used continuously for a period commencing prior to the enactment of the 1906 law, and in some instances for a period upwards of 150 years; and

"Whereas the congregations which are now using the said church properties are the following:

"(a) The Frederick Lutheran Church of Charlotte Amalie, St. Thomas, Virgin Islands, now using properties as described under items (1) and (2) above;

"(b) The Lutheran Church of the Lord God of Sabaoth (now designated as 'Christiansted Lutheran Church'), of Christiansted, St. Croix, Virgin Islands, using properties as described in items (3) and (4) above; and

"(c) Holy Trinity Lutheran Church of Frederiksted, St. Croix, Virgin Islands, now using properties described in item (5) above; and

"Whereas the respective congregations have, ever since the time of the initial occupancy of the respective properties as indicated, considered that they had, and have, full rights of ownership in such properties; and

"Whereas it appears from available land records that it was the intent that title to said church properties be vested in the appropriate church bodies, but such land records are incomplete and a definite uncertainty remains with respect to the title of said properties, particularly by reason of the 1906 law, referred to above, and the opinion expressed by the Danish authorities in the note verbale of November 14, 1958; and

"Whereas the history of negotiations between the Government of Denmark and the U.S. Government clearly indicates an intention to leave undisturbed the rights of private ownership and use of church properties in the Virgin Islands; and

"Whereas it is desirable and proper from the standpoint of both public and private interests that right to use and clear title be conclusively established with respect to all church properties in the Virgin Islands by appropriate action of the Congress of the United States, since title to the said lands may be asserted by the United States by interpretation of some of the foregoing quoted documents: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Legislature of the Virgin Islands:

"SEC. 1. That the Congress of the United States is hereby memorialized to enact private legislation with respect to the above-specified properties in a manner so that clear and perpetual title in fee simple be established in each of the said congregations to the properties used by each, as follows:

"(a) church property located at 7 Norre Gade (including No. 34 Kongens Gade), and the parsonage property located at 23 Kongens Gade, both in King's Quarter in the Town of Charlotte Amalie on the Island of St. Thomas, Virgin Islands of U.S.A. to the Frederick Lutheran Church of Charlotte Amalie, St. Thomas, Virgin Islands;

"(b) church property located at No. 4 King Street, and parsonage property located at No. 51 King Street, both in the Town of Christiansted, on the Island of St. Croix, Virgin Islands of U.S.A. to the Lutheran Church of the Lord God of Sabaoth (commonly designated as 'Christiansted Lutheran Church') of Christiansted, St. Croix, Virgin Islands; and

"(c) church property located on Hospital Street, including Nos. 11 to 14, inclusive, in the Town of Frederiksted on the Island of St. Croix, Virgin Islands of U.S.A. to Holy Trinity Lutheran Church of Frederiksted, St. Croix, Virgin Islands.

"SEC. 2. That properly attested copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, to the President of the Senate, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to the chairmen of the Committees on Interior and Insular Affairs of the Congress, and to the Secretary of the Interior of the United States.

"Thus passed by the Legislature of the Virgin Islands on September 28, 1959.

"Be it resolved by the Legislature of the Territory of Guam—

"Whereas the Honorable ALAN BIBLE, Senator from Nevada, and member of the Senate Interior and Insular Affairs Committee, has on frequent occasions served the interests of the people of the territory of Guam; and

"Whereas this desire on the part of Senator BIBLE to help the people of Guam is best demonstrated by his cosponsorship with Senator CARROLL of Senate bill 2093, which would, if enacted, award claims to certain Guamanians killed or captured at Wake Island; Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Fifth Guam Legislature does hereby extend to the Honorable ALAN BIBLE, Senator from Nevada, the deep and sincere gratitude of the people of Guam for his unstinted efforts made on their behalf; and be it further

"Resolved, That the speaker certify to and the legislative secretary attest the adoption hereof and that copies of the same be thereafter transmitted to the Honorable ALAN BIBLE, Senator from Nevada; to the Presiding Officer of the U.S. Senate, and to the Governor of Guam.

"Be it resolved by the Legislature of the territory of Guam—

"Whereas the Honorable PHILIP A. HART, Senator from Michigan and member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, has rendered valuable services to the speaker of this legislature upon the latter's visits to Washington, thereby demonstrating his warm sympathy and sincere interest in the problems of this territory; and

"Resolved, that the Fifth Guam Legislature does hereby, on behalf of the people of Guam, extend to the Honorable PHILIP A. A resolution of the Legislature of Saipan; to the Committee on Armed Services:

"RESOLUTION 6

"Resolution relative to respectfully requesting and memorializing the Commander in Chief, U.S. Pacific Fleet, Trustee of the Saipan District Special Land Fund, to cause the said fund to be deposited with the Bank of America, National Trust & Savings Association.

"Be it resolved by the Saipan Legislature—

"Whereas the U.S. Congress appropriate approximately $970,000, designated as the Saipan Special Fund, as and for payment and compensation for the use by the U.S. Government of certain parcels of real property within the Saipan district, all of which moneys are presently deposited with the Bank of Hawaii, State of Hawaii, the commander in chief, U.S. Pacific Fleet, as Trustee; and

"Whereas according to information and belief, only the income realized from such fund, and not any part or portion of the principal, may be disbursed and utilized for the benefit of the indigenous inhabitants of the Saipan district; and

"Whereas the Bank of America, National Trust & Savings Association, through its Saipan branch, has over the years of its local operation been of enormous aid and assistance to the people of Saipan for real estate and home improvement purchase, by extending credit to the local businesses, by making personal loans to pay for various family emergencies, and by encouraging thrift through savings accounts, all of which practices have not only been of major importance and significance to the economy and stability of the Saipan district but also the welfare and well-being of the people thereof; and

"Whereas the said Bank of America is not only a member of the Federal Reserve System, but also the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, thereby insuring federally its deposits, while the Bank of Hawaii is not a member of either, unless such membership has been recently effected; and

"Whereas in view of the foregoing, it is only fair, equitable, and judicious that the said Saipan District Special Land Fund presently on deposit with the Bank of Hawaii be withdrawn and deposited with the Bank of America, National Trust & Savings Association, Saipan branch, which fund if so deposited will earn interest at the rate of 3 percent per annum and also be fully secured and guaranteed by U.S. bonds, U.S. interest-bearing notes, and other U.S. obligations: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, that copies of this resolution be transmitted to the commander in chief, U.S. Pacific Fleet, the Presiding Officer of the U.S. Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of the Interior, the High Commissioner of the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, the commander, Naval Forces, Marianas, and to the naval administrator of the Saipan district.

"Be it resolved by the Legislature of Saipan—

"Whereas prior to the Spanish-American War, the indigenous inhabitants of the Marianas Islands were all joined together both politically and geographically, all of one race, known as Chamarros, spoke a common language and observed the same religions and social customs; and

"Whereas prior to the Spanish-American War, the island of Guam served as the capital of the Marianas; and

"Whereas the separation of the other Marianas Islands from the island of Guam by the Treaty of Paris resulted in nearly half a century of anxiety and uncertainty regarding the fate of the people living there and whose history since that separation has been a tragic one of shifting allegiance from one flag to another until our liberation from the Japanese during World War II; and

"Whereas the Fourth Guam Legislature adopted Resolution No. 367 requesting the Congress of the United States, to cause the political reintegration of the Marianas Islands within the governmental framework of the territory of Guam; and

"Whereas, at the present time the Marianas Islands, other than Guam, are governed by a trusteeship under a charter of the United Nations; and

"Whereas, article 76 of the United Nations Charter states:

"'Article 76. The basic objectives of the trusteeship system, in accordance with the purposes of the United Nations laid down in article I of the present charter, shall be:

"'a. to further international peace and security;

"'b. to promote the political, economic, social and educational advancement of the inhabitants of the trust territories, and their progressive development toward self-government or independence as may be appropriate to the particular circumstances of each territory and its peoples and the freely expressed wishes of the peoples concerned, and as may be provided by the terms of such trusteeship agreement;

"'c. to encourage respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion, and to encourage recognition of interdependence of the peoples of the world; and

"'d. to ensure equal treatment in social, economic and commercial matters for all members of the United Nations and their nationals, and also equal treatment for the latter in the administration of justice, without prejudice to the attainment of the foregoing objective and subject to the provisions of article 80;' and

"Whereas, the trusteeship agreement entered into by the United States with the United Nations contains within it the following article 9:

"'ARTICLE 9

"'The administering authority shall be entitled to constitute the trust territory into a customs, fiscal, or administrative union or federation with other territories under United States jurisdiction and to establish common services between such territories and the trust territory where such measures are not inconsistent with the basic objectives of the international trusteeship system and with the terms of this agreement'; which article indicates that the northern Marianas may be instituted into the Territory of Guam as part of an administrative union or federation, since such a measure would not be inconsistent with the basic objectives of the trusteeship system but would indeed be the culmination of the desires of the inhabitants of all the Marianas; and

"Whereas the Legislature of Saipan has received an overwhelming favorable response from the people living in the district of Saipan toward the reintegration within the framework of the Territory of Guam; and

"Whereas it is believed by the Legislature of Saipan that should a plebiscite be conducted in the future among the people living throughout the Marianas Islands, the vast majority would favor such reintegrations; and

"Whereas the benefits of such a reunification of the Marianas, aside from the spiritual and moral uplift to be derived therefrom, would also mean a more viable economy for all the islands, with the increased trade and travel meaning more prosperity and economic independence; and

"Whereas this aspiration that all the people of the Marianas be reunited within the framework of one system of free and representative government is a hope that can be shared by freedom-loving people all over the world, since the underlying desire is to permit the government of the Marianas Islands to be 'of the people, by the people, and for the people': Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the 12th Saipan Legislature does hereby on behalf of the people of the Marianas Islands respectfully request and memorialize the United Nations to take under serious consideration the future reintegration of the Marianas Islands within the governmental framework of the Territory of Guam, including the granting of U.S. citizenship; and be it further

"Resolved, That the United Nations undertake the study of recommendations to hold plebiscite throughout the Marianas Islands for the purpose of allowing the inhabitants thereof to freely express their desires and views on this important subject of reintegration; and be it further

"Resolved, That the speaker certify to and the legislative secretary attest the adoption hereof and that copies of the same be thereafter transmitted to the President of the United States, to the Secretary General of the United Nations, to the President of the Senate, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to the chairmen of the Committees on Interior and Insular Affairs, Senate and House, to the Secretary of State, to the Secretary of the Interior, to the High Commissioner of the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, to the Secretary of Defense, to commander naval forces Marianas, to the naval administrator of the Saipan district, to the speaker of the Guam Legislature, and to the Governor of Guam.

"Dated this 23d day of September 1959.

"OLYMPIO T. BORJA,
"Speaker.

"Attested:

"JOSE R. CRUZ,
"Legislative Secretary.

"Approved this 25th day of September 1959.

RESOLUTIONS OF WISCONSIN STATE LEGISLATURE

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, we recognize that in the days ahead the Congress and the Nation will need to find solutions to several complex problems affecting a great many aspects of American life.

As always, it is important, I believe, to keep closely attuned to thinking in our States and local communities—in effect, at the "grassroots"—on the factors involved in these challenges.

Consequently, I was recently gratified to receive from the State Legislature in Wisconsin resolutions adopted by that august body, conveying to Congress its views on a variety of topics.

The issues involved in the four resolutions are as follows:

First. Joint resolution memorializing Congress to take steps to restrict the importation of veneer to compete with our lumber industry;

Second. Joint resolution memorializing Congress to oppose legislation prescribing any minimum interest rate, or any maximum maturity dates for securities issued by cooperatives in payment of patronage saving payable to their patrons;

Third. Joint resolution urging Congress to relax immigration quota restrictions which bar relatives of Americans; and Fourth. Joint resolution memorializing Congress to expedite the free flow of high-grade milk in interstate commerce.

As my colleagues are well aware, the subject matters of these resolutions are of great interest not only to Wisconsin but to the whole Nation. Believing that the resolutions reflect significant thinking on problems which the Senate will be facing in the days ahead, I request unanimous consent to have the resolutions printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred:

There being no objection, the resolutions were received and appropriately referred, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Committee on Banking and Currency:

"JOINT RESOLUTION 51

"Joint resolution memorializing Congress to oppose legislation prescribing any minimum interest rate or any maximum maturity dates for securities issued by cooperatives in payment of patronage savings payable to their patrons

"Whereas business enterprises are made up of several types of business organizations, including proprietorships, partnerships, corporations and cooperatives, all of which contribute greatly to the tempo of economic activity within the State; and

"Whereas Wisconsin is one of the leading cooperative States of the Nation, and particularly within the rural areas cooperatives have greatly benefited and rendered service to their members; and

"Whereas the tax position of cooperatives has been thoroughly investigated by the Congress of the United States over a long period of time and these investigations have revealed that under the present laws, the cooperatives have faithfully abided by the principles and regulations under which they have been organized; and

"Whereas the cooperatives do pay taxes and in many communities of this State are the largest taxpayers; and

"Whereas the Secretary of the Treasury has recommended to Congress to require cooperative patronage savings to be paid in cash within 3 years and to draw not less than 4-percent interest, or otherwise to be classified as income to the cooperative and be thereby subjected to corporation income taxes; and

"Whereas this alteration of the present tax status would seriously hamper and restrict the services which the cooperatives are performing within the State: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States is requested to recognize that indebtedness which is owed by a cooperative or any other taxpayer to its patrons or customers is not income to such taxpayer even though it may be income to its patrons or customers; and, be it further

"Resolved, That the Congress of the United States be specifically requested to oppose any measures which would prescribe any minimum interest rate or any maximum maturity dates for securities which are issued by cooperatives in payment of patronage savings payable to their patrons; and, be it further

"Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury, the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to each Member of Congress from the State of Wisconsin."

"JOINT RESOLUTION 32

"Joint resolution memorializing Congress to take steps to restrict the importation of veneer to compete with our lumber industry

"Whereas the wood veneer industry has long been one of the leading industries in Wisconsin; and

"Whereas a good portion of Wisconsin's population derives its sole income from the processing of wood products; and

"Whereas similar wood products from foreign countries are able to compete in the American market because shipping costs are offset by lower labor costs; and

"Whereas this unfair competition has seriously depressed the important veneer industry resulting in widespread unemployment among the people within and dependent upon the industry: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That the legislature urge the Congress of the United States to give consideration to this problem and to take steps to reduce the foreign competition in the veneer industry; and, be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be submitted to the Honorable Dwight D. Eisenhower, President of the United States, the Secretary of the U.S. Senate, the Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives, and each Member of the Wisconsin delegation in Congress.

"PHILIP NASH,
"President of the Senate.
"LAWRENCE R. LARSEN,
"Chief Clerk of the Senate.
"GEORGE MOLINARO,
"Speaker of the Assembly.
"NORMAN C. ANDERSON,
"Chief Clerk of the Assembly."

To the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

"JOINT RESOLUTION 69

"Joint resolution memorializing Congress to expedite the free flow of high-grade milk in interstate commerce

"Whereas dairying is one of the principal industries of Wisconsin; and

"Whereas in 1957 approximately 1,213,899,000 pounds of milk out of a total of 17,412 million pounds produced in this State was shipped out of the State; and

"Whereas such milk should have the same competitive opportunities as milk produced in other States including the State of consumption; and

"Whereas the purity and high quality of the milk produced in this State assures that the consumer throughout the Nation would benefit from its use: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That the Wisconsin Legislature memorialize the Congress of the United States to take appropriate action to remove the barriers imposed by the several States and permit the free flow of high quality milk among the several States; and, be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be submitted to the Honorable Dwight D. Eisenhower, President of the United States, the Honorable Ezra T. Benson, Secretary of Agriculture, and to each Member of the Wisconsin delegation in Congress."

To the Committee on the Judiciary:

"JOINT RESOLUTION 66

"Joint resolution urging Congress to relax immigration quota restrictions which bar relatives of Americans

"Whereas many Americans who filed petitions with the immigration authorities of the United States for the entry of their sons, daughters, brothers, and sisters, which petitions are classified in the fourth preference quota of the Immigration and Nationality Act; and

"Whereas of the four preference quotas established by the Federal Immigration and Nationality Act, the first, second, and third quotas are allotted 100 percent of the total annual entry quota; and

"Whereas as a result, those persons who fall within the fourth preference section must depend for entry into this country upon deficiencies in the first three quotas; and

"Whereas there is frustration and despair resulting from the law that gives hope to Americans by permitting them to file petitions, getting them approved, and then compelling them to wait for their kin who may never come; and

"Whereas thousands of discontented people abroad, whose hopes are first raised and then dashed, certainly cannot believe in the good will we try to engender through our foreign policy, and thus become easy prey to the propaganda of unfriendly nations; and

"Whereas Congress has recognized and alleviated a similar problem through Public Law 85-316, which includes a provision for reuniting spouses and minor children of aliens legally residing in this country whose petitions were approved prior to July 1, 1957: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States is respectfully urged to amend the provisions of Public Law 85-316 to include cases which fall within the fourth preference quota, in order to provide for entry of the many thousands of relatives of Americans, petitions for whom have piled up in prior years; that in order not to create another problem of separated families, those applicants who are married and have families be permitted to bring them; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to each Congressman and U.S. Senator from Wisconsin."

RESOLUTION OF NORTH CAROLINA BOARD OF CONSERVATION AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. JORDAN. Mr. President, for some time the Interior Department's Office of Saline Water has been conducting research on conversion of sea water into fresh water at Harbor Island, Wrightsville Beach, N.C., utilizing the International Nickel Co.'s corrosion research facility there.

The North Carolina Board of Conservation and Development recently adopted a resolution commending the Secretary of Interior, the Director of the Office of Saline Water, and the International Nickel Co. for their constructive and farsighted efforts in this project. The contribution made by the Harbor Island operation, I believe, fully deserves this recognition and this praise.

Expansion of fresh water resources is of vital importance not only to the future health of the American people, but also to our continued agricultural and economic growth. Recognizing the substantial progress in research in this field, as well as the urgency of the program, Congress in 1958 approved the construction of five development plants for conversion of saline and brackish water. The Office of Saline Water will shortly choose an east coast site for one of the saline water conversion plants.

In view of its successful experience at Harbor Island and of the demonstrated interest and support of the State of North Carolina, I hope that the Office of Saline Water will give serious consideration to locating this new plant in our State. Such a choice would assure that the development facility, drawing on the skills and know-how available at Harbor Island, would move into operation promptly and successfully, to the benefit of the entire Nation.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred the text of the resolution adopted by the North Carolina Board of Conservation and Development and a letter from the board to Mr. Henry S. Wingate, president of the International Nickel Co.

There being no objection, the resolution and letter were referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE AND INDUSTRY AND ADOPTED BY THE NORTH CAROLINA BOARD OF CONSERVATION AND DEVELOPMENT AT ITS MEETING IN CHARLOTTE ON OCTOBER 26 AND 27, 1959

Whereas the Office of Saline Water of the Department of the Interior has made outstandingly significant research and development achievements in processes for economically converting sea water in commercial quantities to pure fresh water in cooperation with the International Nickel Co. Experiment Station on Harbor Island, Wrightsville Beach, N.C., and

Whereas the State of North Carolina is competing with the other States on the eastern seaboard of the United States for one of five authorized experimental commercial conversion plants; and

Whereas appropriate site studies for North Carolina have already been submitted to and accepted by the Office of Saline Water of the Department of the Interior: Now therefore, be it,

Resolved, That:

1. The Board of Conservation and Development of the State of North Carolina express official appreciation to the Secretary of the Department of the Interior and to the Director of the Office of Saline Water of that Department for the pioneering research and development work done in developing the above processes for the commercial conversion of sea water to fresh water by that governmental agency in cooperation with the International Nickel Co. within North Carolina on Harbor Island, Wrightsville Beach.

2. An official invitation be extended to the Secretary of the Interior or his representative and the Director of the Office of Saline Water to visit this State as guests of North Carolina for the purpose of determining its suitability as the site for the east coast plant location.

3. A copy of this resolution be sent to the president or board chairman of the International Nickel Co. and to the head of their experiment station at Harbor Island, Wrightsville Beach.

4. The Director of the Department of Conservation and Development be authorized to furnish a copy of this resolution to each Members of the North Carolina congressional delegation in Congress and to any other representation deemed appropriate by the Director of the Department of Conservation and Development.

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA, DEPARTMENT OF CONSERVATION AND DEVELOPMENT,
Raleigh, November 24, 1959.

Mr. HENRY S. WINGATE,
President, the International Nickel Co., Inc., Copper Cliff, Ontario.

DEAR MR. WINGATE: The people of the State of North Carolina are very much appreciative of the research and development accomplishments of your staff and facilities at Harbor Island, Wrightsville Beach, especially that done in cooperation with the Office of Saline Water of the U.S. Department of the Interior.

I am attaching a copy of a resolution which I was requested to send you by the North Carolina Board of Conservation and Development at a meeting which was held in Charlotte, N.C., on October 26-27, 1959.

When you can find it convenient, please do us the honor of a visit. For your information, Governor Hodges has written Secretary Seaton of the Department of the Interior and Dr. A. L. Miller, Director of the Office of Saline Water, inviting them to visit North Carolina in compliance with the resolution.

Sincerely,

WILLIAM P. SAUNDERS.

RESOLUTION OF AMERICAN PUBLIC HEALTH ASSOCIATION

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a resolution adopted by the American Public Health Association, in support of the bill (S. 2009) to provide long-term Federal loans for the acquisition of facilities to approved voluntary health service programs, be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HEALTH SERVICES FACILITIES

Whereas certain desirable health services facilities, including consumer-sponsored, nonprofit, prepaid, group practice clinics, unaffiliated with any hospital, are at present excluded from Federal financial support; and

Whereas such nonprofit groups provide services that generally have stressed preventive services and rehabilitation, prevented much unnecessary hospitalization, provided basic economies in medical services, and extended the scope of high-quality health services; and

Whereas long-term, low-interest-rate loans usually are not obtainable through any source other than government, and such loans are urgently needed: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the American Public Health Association endorse the principle of long-term Federal loans to those nonprofit, prepaid, group practice plans meeting sound professional standards, such standards to be defined and administered by the U.S. Public Health Service in cooperation with State and local health agencies.

RESOLUTION OF TOWN BOARD OF THE TOWN OF GEDDES, N.Y.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the town board of the town of Geddes, N.Y., requesting the Congress to continue the income from municipal bonds under a tax-exempt status.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION OF THE TOWN BOARD OF THE TOWN OF GEDDES, REQUESTING THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES TO CONTINUE THE INCOME FROM MUNICIPAL BONDS UNDER TAX EXEMPT STATUS

Whereas at present the income from bonds issued to municipalities is exempt from Federal income tax and it is proposed to tax the income from these bonds in the future; and

Whereas if the income from these bonds is made taxable in the future the interest rate to the issuers of municipal bonds will necessarily increase to cover this tax: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, upon the motion of Councilman Arthur Tarolli, duly seconded by Councilman Frederick Clisson, and duly passed, That the Town Board of the Town of Geddes, county of Onondaga, N.Y., go on record as being opposed to placing the income from bonds issued by municipalities under a taxable status, and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forewarded to the Congress of the United States, State Senators and Congressmen and any other proper agency.

Dated this 14th day of December 1959.

DONALD G. COLE,
Geddes Town Clerk.

REQUIREMENT OF DISCLOSURE OF FINANCE CHARGES IN CONNECTION WITH EXTENSIONS OF CONSUMER CREDIT

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE], and the Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE], I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to assist production and stabilization, by requiring the disclosure of finance charges in connection with extensions of consumer credit.

The purpose of this bill is to require lenders and vendors to tell the truth about interest rates and finance charges.

In too many instances, today, the consumer who signs a document that places him in debt would have to be a lawyer in order to understand the fine print that spells out his rights and liabilities; and he would have to be an accountant or an expert in higher mathematics in order to compute in simple annual terms the cost of the credit. Altogether too often he is deceived into paying a higher cost for credit than he has been led to expect by the huckstering of fast-talking salesmen. True annual rates running as high as 30 to 40 percent are camouflaged in terms of rates which are seemingly modest because they are stated as monthly, rather than annual rates, and are further disguised in the form of fees, charges, discounts, and the like—all of which make up the true cost of credit to the consumer.

The average consumer cannot make rational choices in a free, competitive economy unless he is an informed consumer.

This bill would require that he be given, in writing, two vital pieces of information: First, the total amount of the finance charges he is contracting to pay; and, second, the percentage that such an amount bears to the outstanding balance expressed in simple annual interest.

Mr. President, a consumer credit labeling requirement such as I am proposing would restore consumer sovereignty to the American marketplace, where consumer credit has been transformed from a financing mechanism to a merchandising tool, where loans are disguised as sales—to the detriment of our economy.

Personal debt now amounts to $175 billion, which consumers owe on installment purchases, auto loans, personal loans, mortgages, and the like. During the decade of the 1950's alone, personal debt went up 160 percent. In contrast, disposable income went up only 60 percent. At this rate of growth, personal debt could exceed the national debt in just a few years from now.

It is not my purpose in this bill to control consumer credit. The consumer is generally his own best credit manager, provided he has all the facts about the cost of credit.

I simply ask that the borrower and buyer know the truth about what they are being asked to do.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed at this point in the body of the RECORD; and also a descriptive article from the Wall Street Journal of January 6, 1960.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill and article will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 2755) to assist in the promotion of economic stabilization by requiring the disclosure of finance charges in connection with extensions of credit, introduced by Mr. DOUGLAS (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Congress finds and declares that economic stabilization is threatened when credit is used excessively for the acquisition of property and services. The excessive use of credit results frequently from a lack of awareness of the cost thereof to the user. It is the purpose of this act to assure a full disclosure of such cost with a view to preventing the uninformed use of credit to the detriment of the national economy.

Sec. 2. As used in this act, the term—

(1) "Credit" means any loan, residential mortgage, deed of trust, advance, or discount; any conditional sales contract; any contract to sell, or sale, or contract of sale of property or services, either for present or future delivery, under which part or all of the price is payable subsequent to the making of such sale or contract; any rental-purchase contract; any contract or arrangement for the hire, bailment, or leasing of property; any option, demand, lien, pledge, or other claim against, or for the delivery of, property or money; any purchase, discount, or other acquisition of, or any credit upon the security of, any obligation or claim arising out of any of the foregoing; and any transaction or series of transactions having a similar purpose or effect.

(2) "Finance charges" includes charges such as interest, fees, service charges, discounts, and such other charges as the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System may by regulation prescribe.

(3) "Person" means any individual, partnership, association, business trust, corporation, or unincorporated organization.

Sec. 3. Any person engaged in the business of extending credit shall furnish to each person to whom such credit is extended, prior to the consummation of the transaction, a clear statement in writing, in accordance with rules and regulations which the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System shall prescribe, (1) setting forth the total amount of the finance charges to be borne by such person in connection with such extension of credit, and (2) stating the percentage that such amount bears to the outstanding principal obligation, or unpaid balance, expressed in terms of simple annual interest.

Sec. 4. Any regulation under this Act may be established in such form and manner, may contain such classifications and differentiations, and may provide for such adjustments and exceptions as in the judgment of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System are necessary or proper to effectuate the purposes of this Act or to prevent circumvention or evasion, or to facilitate enforcement of this Act, or any rule or regulation issued under this Act. In prescribing any exceptions hereunder with respect to any particular type of credit transaction the Board shall consider whether in the case of such transaction substantial compliance with the disclosure requirements of this Act is being achieved under any other Act of Congress or the law of any State. The Board shall also exempt those credit transactions between business firms as to which it determines adherence with the disclosure requirements of this Act is not necessary to carry out the purpose of this Act.

Sec. 5. No person shall extend credit in contravention of this Act or of any regulation prescribed thereunder.

Sec. 6. Any person who willfully violates any provision of this Act or any rule or regulation issued thereunder shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than 1 year, or both.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent that the bill lie at the desk for additional cosponsors until Tuesday of next week.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article presented by Mr. DOUGLAS is as follows:

DEMOCRATS TO ASK BILL TO REQUIRE LABELS FOR LOANS—CONSUMERS WOULD BE TOLD OF TOTAL FINANCE CHARGES, ANNUAL INTEREST RATES—CONTROLS HELD ALTERNATIVE

(By Robert D. Novak)

WASHINGTON.—Democrats have devised a legislative spotlight to shine on the issue of high interest rates. They hope to make use of it during the coming session of Congress and possibly in the election campaign that lies beyond it.

Illinois' Senator DOUGLAS, with backing from other important "liberal" lawmakers, is about to introduce a bill to require lenders to inform consumer borrowers of the total finance charges and annual interest rates they pay. Backers claim such costs are higher than most borrowers realize.

Consumer groups long have contended that such legislation is necessary to show the public just how much cash it is forking over when it buys on time. Now the "interest-rate labeling" bill is picking up considerable Democratic backing in both Houses for more political reasons. Some see it as an alternative to the more drastic step of outright Federal controls on consumer credit; others view it as fuel for an expected Democratic "antibanker" campaign leading up to the November election. Because of talk of Federal controls, some Federal Reserve Board economists—who oppose controls—have shown interest in a labeling bill.

Here are samples, not necessarily typical, of the problems now said to exist and of the proposed cures:

A retailer now tells a purchaser only that a new TV set will cost him so much down and so much a month. Under a labeling law, the seller would have to make clear that the installment-plan carrying charges might amount to an exorbitant interest rate, figured annually, such as when a lender charges a rate in excess of 4 percent a month where State antiusury laws don't prevent.

A small loan company now tells a borrower simply that the interest rate on a loan is 3 percent a month. Under labeling, the lender would have to specify that the annual interest rate might amount to 36 percent, varying according to terms of the loan.

MORTGAGE LENDING TERMS

A mortgage lender now informs a home buyer merely that the interest rate on his loan is 6 percent a year. Under labeling, the lender would have to add that finance charges, say, on a $20,000 home loan might exceed $10,000 over a 25-year span.

In any case, the Federal Reserve Board would draft specific regulations. Willful violators would face a jail sentence, a fine, or both.

To be sure, any customer can already ask for the financing facts or figure out the credit costs for himself. Nevertheless, sponsors of the bill contend the man in the street simply doesn't go to that trouble.

Backers will try to sell their bill partly as a logical extension of the pattern of federally imposed labeling—describing the ingredients of food, names of furs and fibers, and the basic prices of automobiles.

But they also will advocate the interest rate proposal as a means of getting people to hold down their borrowings. The Federal Reserve Board has just reported that consumer installment credit, the biggest up-and-down factor in total consumer credit, climbed to yet another record at the end of November; at $38.7 billion, it stood $5.4 billion above a year earlier. If only borrowers realized how much such debt was costing them, the would-be labelers argue, they'd brake their borrowing.

FEAR CONTROLS

The alternative to such action, proponents warn, may be compulsion. And the idea of standby credit controls is picking up some steam, possibly enough to make it a serious threat in 1961. A recent report of the special staff hired by the Senate-House Economic Committee, for example, recommends selective credit controls.

A draft of the interest rate labeling bill explicitly sets out this purpose in its preamble: "* * * Economic stabilization is threatened when credit is used excessively for the acquisition of property and services. The excessive use of credit results frequently from a lack of awareness of the cost thereof to the user. It is the purpose of this act to assure a full disclosure of such cost with a view to preventing the uninformed use of credit to the detriment of the national economy." In other words, John Doe might not go into hock to buy that washing machine if he knows how much it's going to cost him in finance charges.

Skeptics claim, however, that once John Doe has decided he wants a washing machine, high credit costs won't stop him. Moreover, even those who consider labeling as a deterrent to consumer borrowing note the plan has no variable factors; they maintain it might inhibit needed consumer purchases during a recession. To this argument, one backer of the bill replies: "Is honesty a variable?"

But any success the labeling plan may enjoy probably will derive from its place in the election-year interest rate fight. "It's all part of the mosaic," asserts a proponent of the plan. Frustrated by the Republican theme of "peace and prosperity," many Democrats believe the best counterattack lies in an attempt to blame the Eisenhower administration for mounting credit costs. Democratic opposition to the Eisenhower proposal to remove the 4¼-percent ceiling on interest rates for new Government bonds is the key part of this campaign.

These broad political implications may be exploited during congressional hearings on the labeling bills. Sponsors are confident their idea will be publicized at least through lengthy Senate hearings and possibly in similar hearings in the House. And if the bill actually passes, labeling itself would tend to dramatize the Democratic position.

OPPOSITION TO BILL

Opposition to the bill probably will be based on claims that it interferes unnecessarily with the business process and violates States' rights by taking on the job that State antiusury laws are supposed to do. These laws set ceilings on interest costs, usually by limiting monthly rates.

But Republicans, while stressing these objections, may find it hard to oppose the measure. "It's like voting for sin," declares one Democrat. Certainly, many Republicans accepted the Democratic-sponsored auto price labeling law of 1958 without protest; it passed with unexpected ease.

Opposition to credit labeling from the business world, particularly from merchandisers who depend heavily on credit purchases, may be more determined. However, sponsors of the bill say they may get surprising backing from small loan companies wary of being tagged as "loan sharks."

In the end prospects for congressional passage will hinge on the still uncertain attitude of the Democratic leadership. Senate Majority Leader JOHNSON is an advocate of going to the mat with the Republicans over interest rates and so could be considered a potential backer of the bill. But it is understood, Senator JOHNSON is considering an election-year congressional study of the entire consumer credit question, and that could put the labeling bill on the shelf.

For a closeup glimpse of the effects of credit labeling, take a hypothetical case of a customer buying a high-fidelity phonograph on time. The retailer may tell him simply that the phonograph will cost $250—a $50 downpayment and $20 a month for 10 months.

BREAKDOWN OF CHARGES

But the labeling bill would require the retailer to disclose the breakdown between the cost of the phonograph itself and the finance or carrying charges—say, $230 for the phonograph and $20 for financing. More important, the retailer would be required to list the actual interest rate on an annual basis, in this case, 20 percent.

The bill would work much the same way if the hi-fi enthusiast applied to a small loan company or a bank for enough money to buy the phonograph. Assume that after plunking down his $50 downpayment, he borrowed the $180 at 6 percent interest, to be paid back in monthly installments of $15.90. Since the borrower would have the full $180 for only a month, the true annual interest would not be 6 percent but a little over 11 percent, and the 11 percent figure is the one the small loan company would have to present to the borrower.

SPOUSES' ANNUITIES AND THE RAILROAD RETIREMENT ACT

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, a group of retired Oregon railroad employees last fall requested the introduction of an amendment to the Railroad Retirement Act relating to spouses' benefits.

With the assistance of legislative counsel of the Senate, I have prepared such an amendment which I now introduce for appropriate reference.

This amendment is designed to remove the restriction presently found in the Railroad Retirement Act which has the legal effect of preventing a person who is married to a railroad employee from receiving social security benefits to which such person otherwise would be entitled on the basis of his or her own earnings.

When this request was presented by the retired railroad employees, I advised that I would be glad to introduce the type of amendment they desire and that I would ask for early hearings on the amendment in the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

The railroad retirement law is one of the most complex of the Federal laws now on our statute books. Any amendment to the law, therefore, would have to be subjected to close scrutiny by the committee. Such scrutiny is essential in order that the legal and economic effects of the amendment may be understood by all interested parties.

I urge the committee to which this bill is referred to schedule early hearings so that the proponents and others interested in the amendment may have full opportunity to make known their views on this proposal during the current session of the Congress.

These retired employees believe an injustice is being done to them, and in my opinion there is much merit in their point of view. As chairman of the Railroad Retirement Subcommittee I shall request early hearings on this bill.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill and some correspondence in connection with it be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill and correspondence will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 2758) to amend the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937 to eliminate the requirement that a spouse's annuity be reduced if the spouse is eligible to receive certain social security benefits, introduced by Mr. MORSE, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the third proviso of section 2(e) of the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937, as amended, is amended to read as follows: "And provided further, That any spouse's annuity shall be reduced by the amount of any annuity to which such spouse is entitled, or on proper application would be entitled, under subsection (a) of this section or subsection (d) of section 5 of this Act."

SEC. 2. The amendment made by the first section of this Act shall apply only with respect to annuities accruing under the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937, as amended, for months after the month in which this Act is enacted.

The correspondence presented by Mr. MORSE is as follows:

COMMENT ON PROPOSED BILL

By the Legislative Committee, Portland Unit No. 55, National Association of Retired and Veteran Railway Employees.

The issue of restoring dual spouse benefits to annuitants having social security benefits in their own rights has been introduced a number of times and little consideration given. It is hard to understand the discrimination and injustice in this legislation has been sidestepped.

Dual benefits were restored to employee annuitants in 1954 retroactive to November 1, 1951, and to surviving widows in 1956. The same principle is involved for the beneficiary complies with all requirements of the Railroad Retirement Act and the Social Security Act, pays the required premiums (taxes) for insurance in both agencies, but denied benefits when aged and needed. It is no different than having two annuities, one for example in the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., and one in the New York Life Insurance Co. If you pay the premiums they pay the annuities.

It so happens the majority of these spouses were in low paid brackets of annuitants retired a number of years ago, and necessary for them to help support the family, mate, incapacitated or infirm. They qualified for social security but now denied benefits. Is it just? Is the discrimination warranted?

In the 1954 amendments (restoration of dual benefits to employees) H.R. 356, "the removal of inequities from the railroad system is a policy which the Congress adopted in the belief that the elimination of inequities justified the additional cost." In 1955 when H.R. 4744 became a law this principle was sustained by restoring dual benefits to survivors. A widow collects her annuity in full and no deduction by reason of social security benefits in her own rights. The same principle should apply to the spouse.

Recent amendments effective June 1, 1959, the estimated deficit is 0.60 percent of taxable payroll basis or in dollars 34 million. (Cost level basis.) The Railroad Retirement Board's statement released said these amendments placed the railroad retirement fund * * * on a sound basis. Increases in the past have been granted when the deficit was much greater than 0.60 percent. In 1951 it was 1.93 percent, 0.91 percent, and increased to 1.06 percent and in 1955 1.40 percent. In 1959 the deficit was 3.20 percent when corrective measures were enacted into law effective June 1, 1959.

The estimated cost of restoration of dual benefits to spouses having social security benefits in their own rights is 0.2 percent (or 0.20 percent) of the taxable payroll, equivalent to a little over 11 million a year on a level basis as of July 1, 1959. This is borne out by correspondence with the U.S. Railroad Retirement Board (shown below).

Therefore the facts and sustaining figures show to restore dual benefits to spouses having social security in their own rights will not jeopardize the financial status nor create any such deficit as has existed when the last four liberalizing amendments were enacted to the Railroad Retirement Act. We ask in the name of justice this inequity be corrected.

PORTLAND, OREG., June 16, 1959.

Mr. HORACE W. HARPER,
Member, Railroad Retirement Board,
Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: Will you please give me an estimate of the number of spouse annuitants on the beneficiary rolls as of July 1, 1959, that have social security benefits in their own right, and second—the number of spouses expected to make application for reduced annuities?

Of course, we realize that it would be hard to determine how many of this group would have social security benefits in their own right.

What is the estimated cost of restoring dual benefits to spouses who have social security benefits in their own right?

I am trying to secure data to correct this inequity. Dual benefits were restored to employee annuitants in June 1954, and to widows in 1955. Any information you can give on this subject will be greatly appreciated.

We want to be reasonable in request and not jeopardize the safety of the railroad retirement fund, presenting facts in good faith, and placing benefits where most needed.

Thanking you for consideration, I beg to remain,

Respectfully yours,

H. P. OLDHAM,
Grand Director.

CHICAGO, ILL., June 25, 1959.

Mr. H. P. OLDHAM,

Grand Director, National Association of Retired and Veteran Railway Employees, Portland, Oreg.

DEAR MR. OLDHAM: We can only make rough estimates of the information you requested in your letter of June 16, 1959. They are as follows:

1. Number of spouse annuitants on the board's beneficiary rolls on July 1, 1959, who will be receiving social security benefits in their own right—10,000.

2. Number of spouses expected to make application for reduced annuities during fiscal year 1959–1960—25,000.

(We have no basis for estimating the number in this group entitled to their own social security benefits, but do not believe it is fiscal year 1959–60—25,000.

3. Estimated cost of restoring dual benefits to spouses with social security benefits in their own right—about 0.2 percent of taxable payroll, equivalent to a little over $11 million a year on a level basis.

I am glad to be able to help you in this matter.

Sincerely yours,

HORACE W. HARPER.

OCTOBER 24, 1959.

Mr. H. P. OLDHAM,

Chairman, Legislative Committee, Portland Unit No. 55, National Association of Retired and Veteran Railway Employees, Portland, Oreg.

DEAR MR. OLDHAM: In going over my accumulated work, I find your letter of September 21 in which you requested the introduction of a bill for restoration of dual benefits to spouses who are also recipients of personal social security benefits.

As I indicated at the Portland meeting, I shall be glad to introduce a bill of that type and you may be sure that I shall do everything possible to obtain hearings. In all frankness, I should tell you that the likelihood of committee action in what is predicted to be a very short session of Congress is somewhat doubtful, but I shall work to the best of my ability to get hearings and consideration of your amendment despite the odds against committee action.

May I take this opportunity to again express my best regards to the members of your organization. I enjoyed very much meeting with you in Portland.

With kindest regards,

Sincerely,

WAYNE MORSE.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF RETIRED AND VETERAN RAILWAY EMPLOYEES,
Portland, Oreg., September 21, 1959.

Hon. WAYNE MORSE,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I presume you have received a proposal to amend the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937 as amended, from the secretary of Portland unit, No. 55, for restoration of dual benefits to spouses having social security in their own rights.

We feel this inequity should be corrected as soon as can be done to relieve quite a number whose annuities are in the low bracket, and still not overburden the railroad retirement fund, nor need a tax increase to cover.

There are over 700 members in this Portland Unit, No. 55, and we hope to have 750 by the end of the year.

There are some 300 in Eugene, and no doubt Eugene unit will ask Congressman Porter to introduce in House. Roseburg, No. 58, has near 250, I am told, and all these units are enjoying a steady growth.

We know you are chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Labor and Public Welfare, our friend, and the proper person for us to ask for introduction. We know the importance of early introduction, as you impressed our committee in conference on this point on a previous occasion. It was my intent as chairman of the Portland unit to submit this proposal when the recent amendments were disposed of. An automobile accident in June grounded me for some time and prevented action.

We do not feel a general increase for all beneficiaries is warranted until it is determined what the effect of last amendments do. I do hope you will comply with Portland unit's request and introduce the proposals.

I hope to see you and confer on this and other matters at an early date.

Sincerely,

H. P. OLDHAM,
Chairman Legislative Committee,
Portland Unit No. 55.

STRENGTHENING OF WHEAT MARKETING QUOTA AND PRICE SUPPORT PROGRAM

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill, the purpose of which is to strengthen the wheat marketing quota and price support program. As a matter of fact, the bill follows largely the conference report which was agreed upon by the House and the Senate during the last session of Congress, with very few changes.

The bill provides for a support price of 80 percent of parity, with a 20-percent cut in acreage for the first year, that is, for the crop of 1961.

For the crop of 1962 the support price would be reduced to 75 percent of parity, with an additional 5-percent cut in acreage.

Thereafter, in subsequent years, the supports would be reduced by 5 percent, until the support price reached 65 percent of parity. Thereafter, the price support would not be further decreased.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2759) to strengthen the wheat marketing quota and price support program, introduced by Mr. ELLENDER, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, at this point I ask unanimous consent that a short explanation of the bill be incorporated in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the explanation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This bill, with respect to the 1961 and subsequent wheat crops, would—

(1) Provide price support at 80 percent of parity for the 1961 crop, 75 percent for the 1962 crop, 70 percent for the 1963 crop, and 65 percent for the 1964 and subsequent crops;

(2) Reduce each farm acreage allotment by 20 percent for the 1961 crop, and 25 percent for the 1962 and subsequent crops;

(3) Prevent the diversion of such acreage reduction to other price-supported crops in 1961 (by conditioning wheat price support on reducing the acreage of price supported crops below the 1958–59 average by an acreage equal to the percent of reduction;

(4) Provide a payment in kind in 1961 (one-third average annual yield) on acreage equal to such percent of reduction, if such acreage is not harvested or grazed;

(5) Impose penalties on the actual yield of the excess acres (or double the normal yield if the actual yield is not shown);

(6) Increase the marketing penalty to 65 percent of parity (from 45 percent);

(7) Reduce the 15-acre exemption to 12, and restrict it to farms which planted wheat in 1958, 1959, or 1960 and to producers who produce wheat on only one farm;

(8) Remove the 30-acre limitation on the feed wheat exemption; and

(9) Restrict to farms complying with their allotments the right to withdraw wheat stored from a previous crop to avoid penalty.

The bill would also (a) repeal the 200-bushel exemption; (b) prevent an acreage history penalty where, by reason of production failure, the producer has no marketing excess which he can store to avoid such a penalty; (c) repeal authority for price support for noncooperators for any basic agricultural commodity; and (d) repeal a provision requiring the county agent or the local committee chairman to keep an additional copy of the acreage allotment list for each commodity.

BRAILLE MUSIC FOR THE BLIND

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to establish a library of braille musical scores within the Library of Congress.

My bill would make musical scores available on a loan basis to blind residents of the United States and its possessions under regulations prescribed by the Librarian. The bill would further authorize the appropriation of such Federal funds as may be required for this purpose.

Mr. President, the American Foundation for the Blind estimates that as of July 1, 1959, there were about 355,000 persons in the United States who are considered legally blind in that they have no more than 10 percent of normal vision, even with the assistance afforded by correction. Of this number about 13,000 are blind children attending school.

It is a known fact that persons afflicted with blindness are often unusually sensitive to music, and their participation in this universal language has not only brought great pleasure and culture to the sighted but has helped the visually handicapped to lead richer lives and to communicate with others. Furthermore, braille musical scores have enabled many blind persons to become gainfully employed.

It is true that certain regional libraries—eight, to be exact—do lend braille musical scores, but the listings in the catalogs are definitely limited. The lesser known works as well as selections for such instruments as flute, oboe and bassoon are generally not available. It is also true that certain organizations have braille musical scores for sale only, scores that may neither be borrowed nor exchanged. These, of course, are of real value but many, if not most blinded persons are of limited financial means and cannot afford to purchase the braille music library they desire and need.

I should like to call your attention to the fact that a prominent Oregon attorney, Mr. Nicholas Granet, of Portland, who is also vice chairman of the Oregon State Blind Commission, has urged the introduction of a bill for the establishment of a complete braille music library within the Library of Congress for free rental to all blind persons in the United States.

The Oregon State Blind Commission unanimously adopted a resolution suggesting that a bill be introduced in Congress for the establishment of a complete braille music library.

Mr. President, I wish the RECORD to show that I intend personally to support the recommendations of Mr. Granet, and shall work to the end of accomplishing the goals he has in mind.

It is my sincere hope that this bill will receive favorable and enthusiastic consideration by the Congress in the knowledge that it will not only open the way for many who must otherwise live in darkness, but will also bring pleasure and comfort to those of us who are more fortunate.

Mr. President, I shall work to the end of seeking to bring greater human happiness to these unfortunate people. I shall never place a balanced budget ahead of more balanced lives for our unfortunate blind brethren.

I respectfully request early consideration and hearings on the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2760) to establish a library of braille musical scores within the Library of Congress, introduced by Mr. MORSE, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

VALIDATION OF MILTON-FREEWATER ORCHARD EMERGENCY PAYMENTS

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill designed to provide equitable relief to Oregon farmers in the Milton-Freewater area who were seriously affected in the freeze of 1955.

The Senate will recall that in the 85th Congress legislation was enacted which did much to enable the farmers and fruitgrowers of the area to reestablish themselves and their orchards. Unfortunately, however, a question was raised by the General Accounting Office as to the dates for which payments under Public Law 85–58 could be made. In order to avoid any possible question on this score and in order to make absolutely clear the legislative intent, I requested that the Department of Agriculture provide me with draft legislation which would authorize payments for the emergency conservation measures carried out between January 1, 1956, and June 21, 1957. The bill provides that these payments, if otherwise proper shall not be considered invalid by reason of the fact that they were made for measures carried out prior to the enactment of the public law.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill, together with correspondence from the Comptroller General to the Secretary of Agriculture, dated November 24, 1959, be printed at this point in my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the text of the bill and the correspondence will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 2761) to validate payments made for certain emergency conservation measures under the program authorized by the Third Supplemental Appropriation Act, 1957, introduced by Mr. MORSE, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That payments which have heretofore been made under the program authorized by the Third Supplemental Appropriation Act, 1957, under the item entitled "Emergency Conservation Measures, Agricultural Conservation Program Service", for emergency conservation measures carried out between January 1, 1956, and June 21, 1957, shall, if otherwise proper, not be considered invalid by reason of the fact that they were made for measures carried out prior to the enactment of said Act.

The correspondence presented by Mr. MORSE is as follows:

COMPTROLLER GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, November 24, 1959.

The HONORABLE THE SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: By letter of August 7, 1959, Assistant Secretary E. L. Peterson presented for our consideration the question as to whether emergency conservation measures undertaken as far back as January 1, 1956, may be eligible for cost-sharing under the program authorized by the Third Supplemental Appropriation Act, 1957, Public Law 85–58, approved June 21, 1957, under the item entitled "Emergency Conservation Measures, Agricultural Conservation Program Service."

The portion of the Third Supplemental Appropriation Act, 1957, referred to above (71 Stat. 176) provides in pertinent part as follows:

"For an additional amount to enable the Secretary to make payments to farmers who carry out emergency measures to control wind erosion on farmlands or to rehabilitate farmlands damaged by wind erosion, floods, hurricanes, or other natural disasters when, as a result of the foregoing, new conservation problems have been created which, (1) if not treated, will impair or endanger the land, (2) materially affect the productive capacity of the land, (3) represent damage which is unusual in character and, except for wind erosion, is not the type which would recur frequently in the same area, and (4) will be so costly to rehabilitate that Federal assistance is or will be required to return the land to productive agricultural use, * * *."

The Assistant Secretary advises that upon approval of Public Law 85–58, Supplement 3 to the 1957 National Agricultural Conservation Program was issued authorizing cost-share payments for emergency conservation practices carried out on or after July 1, 1956, and on or before December 31, 1957, the end of the program year of the regular 1957 Agricultural Conservation Program in connection with which the emergency program was carried out. Thus, supplement 3 authorized payment for practices performed prior to approval of Public Law 85–58, that is, work performed during the period from July 1, 1956, the beginning of fiscal year 1957, to June 21, 1957, the date of approval of the act. While the Assistant Secretary indicates that your Department is satisfied that the act authorized payments covering that period, he states that it now has been determined that some of the work for which cost-sharing was paid from the emergency funds appropriated by Public Law 85–58 was carried out prior to July 1, 1956. He further states that, although the regulations specifically stated that practices must have been carried out on or after July 1, 1956, and farmers applying for payment certified that the practices had been carried out in accordance with applicable regulations, investigations conducted by your Department have not disclosed that any farmer who received the payment for practices carried out prior to July 1, 1956, was actually aware that such practices were not eligible under the regulations. The letter indicates that it is the desire of your Department not to demand refund of payments made for otherwise eligible emergency conservation measures carried out prior to July 1, 1956, and supports the propriety of such desire with the contention that, inasmuch as the act authorizing the emergency program was a supplemental appropriation act, the funds appropriated thereby are available for the same period as those appropriated by the basic appropriation act and that, since the basic appropriation act (the Department of Agriculture and Farm Credit Administration Appropriation Act, 1957, 70 stat. 233) appropriated $227,500,000 for cost-sharing in connection with conservation practices carried out during the period July 1, 1955, to December 31, 1956, the funds here in question should be available for the same period.

Generally, a supplemental appropriation act merely appropriates additional funds for the same purposes and programs as the basic appropriation act and subject to the same conditions and restrictions. The funds appropriated by such an act are at least technically available for the same period of time as the funds for the same purpose appropriated by the basic appropriation act. However, it is obvious that the supplemental funds are not actually available for use until they are appropriated and hence cannot be spent or obligated prior to the effective date of the supplemental appropriation act.

In the present instance, the quoted portion of Public Law 85–58 does not appropriate additional funds for the same purposes and programs and subject to the same conditions as the basic appropriation act but, on the contrary, sets up a separate and distinct program for emergency conservation measures, subject to entirely different conditions. Further support for the separateness of this emergency program, if any be required, is furnished by the fact that subsequent appropriations therefor and references thereto appear in Public Laws 85–170 and 85–766 under the separate heading "Emergency Conservation Measures" in the section for the agricultural conservation program service, whereas the funds and authorizations for the regular agricultural conservation program appear in that section in the subsequent appropriation acts for 1958 and 1959 (Public Laws 85–118 and 85–459, respectively) without the separate heading. Thus, the period of time during which regular conservation program practices could be performed to be eligible for cost-sharing payments from the $227,500,000 appropriated by the Department of Agriculture and Farm Credit Administration Appropriation Act, 1957, for the regular program has no bearing on the period during which emergency conservation measures could be performed to be eligible for cost-sharing payments from the $4 million appropriated by the Third Supplemental Appropriation Act, 1957, for the separate and distinct emergency program authorized by the latter act. It should be noted that, while the former act specifically made funds appropriated thereby available to pay for practices carried out prior to its enactment, those practices were carried out under authority contained in the prior appropriation act. This method of authorization and subsequent appropriation has been followed for years in the regular conservation program, whereas the authority for the emergency program is contained in the same act that appropriated funds therefor. Since the authorization for the emergency program did not exist prior to the approval of Public Law 85–58 on June 21, 1957, there does not appear to be any authority to pay for practices carried out prior to that date.

The Assistant Secretary's letter refers to the Third Supplemental Appropriation Act, 1954, Public Law 357, 83d Congress, approved May 11, 1954, 68 stat. 88, as an example of similar emergency legislation in the past which had been applied retroactively. However, that act did not set up a separate emergency program but specifically stated that the funds appropriated thereby were an additional amount for the regular program previously authorized by the Department of Agriculture Appropriation Act, 1954, and specifically authorized payments "to farmers who carry out emergency wind erosion control measures under the 1954 agricultural conservation program after March 30, 1954." Thus, the program conducted under authority of Public Law 357 is clearly entirely different in nature from that established by Public Law 85–58, which is separate from the regular program and does not contain specific authority to pay for practices carried out prior to its enactment.

It is a well established principle of statutory construction that a statute is for prospective application only, in the absence of specific provision to the contrary. As previously indicated, Public Law 85–58 obviously does not specifically authorize payments for practices carried out prior to its enactment. Likewise there is nothing in the legislative history of the provision in question to indicate such an intention. Even the discussion on the floor of the Senate on April 17, 1957, in connection with House Joint Resolution 310, referred to in the letter of August 7, 1959, from the Assistant Secretary and published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 103, part 5, page 5894, gives no indication of an intention to pay for practices carried out prior to enactment of the legislation. In fact, it tends to indicate the contrary. In response to a question from Senator MORSE as to whether the proposed authority for emergency conservation measures would include a freeze as a natural disaster and thus make the freeze-struck orchardists in Oregon eligible for aid thereunder, Senator HAYDEN answered in the affirmative, referred to the four conditions stated in House Joint Resolution 310 (which are identical with those subsequently enacted in Public Law 85–58 and quoted above), and stated that "under these circumstances the money would be available—if this were a disaster—for land treatment measures." In the same discussion, Senator NEUBERGER stated:

"Mr. President, I particularly wish to join with my colleague in expressing appreciation to the Senator from Arizona, because the orchardists in our State, particularly in the Milton-Freewater area, were caught by the disastrous freeze of 1955, and have never recovered from it. Entire orchards were as effectively wiped out as if a fire had swept them. The answer of the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee is very reassuring. I have had many letters from those orchardists in recent weeks who are dependent on such emergency credit to make any start on restoration of their orchards."

This statement indicates an expectation of prospective application of the act and, while it is not completely incompatible with a retroactive application, it affords no positive support therefor.

The appropriation language in Public Law 85–58 was contained originally in H.R. 4249, 85th Congress, on which the following comment is contained in House Report No. 24, 85th Congress:

"A question has been raised as to whether or not authority for payments under this program should be made on a retroactive basis. It has been pointed out that payments for future work to be done gives farmers who have not yet done the necessary work an advantage over farmers in the same area who have already protected their land with such practices at their own expense.

"The committee can fully appreciate and is sympathetic to this point of view. In view of the precedents established on this point, however, it does not believe that authority exists for it to reach back and repay farmers or others for work already done or expenses already incurred.

"The basic legislation supporting this type of activity makes no provision for such retroactive payments. Further, Congress has consistently resisted efforts to enter into retroactive assistance of this kind. Also, such action would raise numerous policy questions such as: How far back should such feature go; who should be included; and what area of the country should be included?"

While the language was justified at that time primarily for the purpose of controlling wind erosion on farm lands, the reasons stated by the committee for denying retroactive payments would be equally applicable to any conservation program under the emergency conservation appropriation. The language was amended on the Senate floor to provide for certain retroactive payments, but the language did not become law and only the original language was included in the Third Supplemental Appropriation Act, which was enacted as Public Law 85–58.

In our opinion Public Law 85–58 did not authorize payments for emergency conservation measures carried out or expenses incurred prior to the date of its enactment and therefore we cannot approve your proposal.

We have considered the fact that your Department, immediately after passage of Public Law 85–58, advised various Members of Congress and interested committees of your intention to authorize cost-share payments under the act for emergency conservation measures carried out subsequent to July 1, 1956, and that no objection thereto was raised. Such action subsequent to the passage of the act is not a part of its legislative history and does not afford a proper legal basis for the construction placed thereon by your Department. However, in view of the length of time which has elapsed since the improper payments were made, the nature of the program involved, and the fact that the payments were made in accordance with regulations issued by your Department which neither the officials making the payments nor the farmers receiving them had any reason to believe were not proper, we will not require recovery from the farmers who received otherwise proper payments for emergency conservation measures carried out subsequent to July 1, 1956. Since the payments for measures carried out prior to July 1, 1956, covered a period of time beyond even that contemplated by your regulations, collection thereof must be required. However, in the light of the reported fact that the farmers who received payments for measures performed prior to July 1, 1956, were innocent of any wrongful intent, we will not object to holding collection action in abeyance during the next session of Congress if your Department desiries to request legislation from Congress which would validate these payments.

Sincerely yours,

JOSEPH CAMPBELL,
Comptroller General of the United States.

EXTENSION OF LIBRARY SERVICES ACT

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to extend for 5 years the Library Services Act, Public Law 597 of the 84th Congress. This act provides to the States Federal matching grants for the extension and improvement of public library service in rural areas.

Mr. President, because a number of Senators are very much interested in the Library Services Act and in the very human need, which it helps to fill, of bringing information of educational and cultural value to the people of rural areas, I ask unanimous consent that the bill I have introduced lie at desk through the close of business on Monday, January 11, for cosponsors.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will lie on the desk, as requested by the Senator from Kentucky.

The bill (S. 2764) to extend for 5 years the authorization for appropriations for the Library Services Act, introduced by Mr. COOPER, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, in this connection, I should like to say that if the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL] desires to introduce a similar bill, on his own behalf—and I think it quite possible that he may, because of the fact that he was the author of the present act—I would certainly defer to him, and would be glad to have him take the initiative in this matter, as I am sure he will.

Mr. President, the act of June 19, 1956, is scheduled to expire on June 30, 1961. The work contemplated under this act will not have been completed, and the goals planned under the act for the development of State and local rural library services will not have been reached in that time—primarily because the amount appropriated for the program has been substantially less than the amount authorized by the Congress. While I believe it is true that under the able and devoted leadership of the senior Senator from Alabama, chairman of the appropriations subcommittee concerned as well as chairman of the Labor and Public Welfare Committee which reported the original bill, the Senate has each year increased the appropriation for the library services program, and the Congress has appropriated more than the budget recommendation—and I may say I have consistently urged the full appropriation—yet much remains to be done.

Secondly, I believe it is generally recognized that this work has proved so very worth while, has been welcomed so gratefully by rural people, and has been so effective in encouraging the States to do more to develop library services for all their people, that the act ought not be allowed to lapse.

It is important to extend the act this year so that there will be no gap in annual appropriations, and more particularly in order to insure that an amount for fiscal 1962 will be included in the regular budget recommendations, which will be prepared later this year. As my colleagues know, it has taken several years to bring this Federal assistance up to the full level of $7½ million authorized by the act, which it reached for the first time this year. Extending the Library Services Act at this time should assure continuity of the program, and I hope the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare will report a bill to do so. I believe the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare will recommend that the act be extended, and that the administration will support this action.

In introducing this bill, I wish to call particular attention to the leadership of the senior Senator from Alabama, the author of the original Senate bill and certainly the person who, more than all others, has been responsible for guiding and encouraging this very human work. I also wish to acknowledge the efforts of the American Library Association, which has given its full support to the act and to appropriations for the program, and the constant support of the Kentucky Library Association, Miss Margaret Willis of the Kentucky Library Extension Division, the Friends of Kentucky Libraries, and the many others who have taken such keen interest in the rural library program.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD at this point a table showing the appropriations for the library service program in each of the past 4 years, together with a statement supporting the extension of the act.

There being no objection, the table and statement were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR COOPER

EXTENSION OF THE RURAL LIBRARY SERVICES PROGRAM

I have introduced today a bill to extend for 5 additional years the program under the Library Services Act (Public Law 84–597, as amended) which provides Federal matching grants to the States for the extension and improvement of public library service in rural areas. According to its original provisions this highly beneficial program will expire on June 30, 1961. Extension of the act is needed, first because the full amount of funds authorized under the act has not been appropriated in any of its first 4 years. Consequently the goals for the much-needed development of library services in rural areas will not be reached, and the hopes of the States to carry out their present plans for this work cannot be realized, unless the act is extended.

Second, the rural library services program has proved so worth while, means so much to thousands of our rural families, and has been so effective in encouraging better State programs, that I am sure the Congress will want to consider extending the program in any event.

To insure that there will be no interruption in the successful development of this useful program, it is important that the act be extended by this Congress. This would provide time for the States to plan for continuation of their programs without gaps or loss of personnel, and should insure that funds for the program are included in the 1962 budget. I hope this Congress will adopt such an extension, which has the support of the administration, of the American Library Association, and of the State library officials and associations as well as the enthusiastic support of the people it reaches.

Since initiation of the program in 1956, notable progress in improving rural library services has been made. Much, however, remains to be done on behalf of the millions of Americans who still do not have library services available. For example, according to testimony presented at last year's hearings before the Senate Subcommittee on Appropriations by Miss Germaine Krettek of the American Library Association, reports from the States show that 25 million Americans in rural areas with 10,000 population or under have no public library service—and another 50 million receive only substandard service. In fact, there are many whole counties without a single public library. The means should be made available, therefore, to help these people continue to grow in knowledge, to open new fields of interest and opportunity to them, and to provide the flow of information essential to an informed and alert citizenry.

Dr. L. Quincy Mumford, the Librarian of Congress, has observed: "Millions of people, in effect, get little opportunity through their lives to do much reading beyond their school textbooks, their local newspapers, an occasional magazine, and perhaps the mail-order catalogs. For most people the public library is the chief—and sometimes the only—means of carrying on their education after they leave school." The public library, he said rightly, "is the adjunct of our free public-school system, and as such is vital to the maintenance of the American tradition of independent thought and action." We cannot afford, I believe, to overlook the need to develop a better read, better informed America in an era of international problems, unprecedented scientific and technological progress, and of great challenge and opportunity.

Before the 84th Congress enacted the Library Services Act in 1956, committees of both Houses heard from the testimony of numerous witnesses the consequences of the neglect of the American public library. It was recognized then, as has been observed many times since, that the school represents only one facet of our educational system, and that we must also assure that public libraries, along with our other educational institutions, operate at a better level of service to the community.

The Library Services Act now authorizes an appropriation of $7,500,000 annually for 5 years through fiscal year 1961. Funds are allotted to the States on the basis of their rural population, and are matched on the basis of each State's per capita income. To remain eligible for a Federal grant, a State must maintain its expenditures for all public library service at least at the same level as in fiscal year 1956. The law further requires that State and local expenditures for rural public library service must not fall below the 1956 level. Funds under the program may be used for salaries, books, and other library materials, equipment, and operating expenses, but not for the erection of buildings or the purchase of land.

Recent figures from the U.S. Office of Education show that 52 States and territories are participating in the rural library services development program. Over 800 rural counties throughout the Nation, with a rural population of over 11 million, have received new or improved library service as a result of the act. Several hundred bookmobiles and other vehicles have been put into operation by State library extension agencies in Kentucky and other States since 1956, in order to serve the people of small communities.

Over $7 million was expended in the first 2 years of the program to buy books and other informational materials. Moreover, State library agency staffs have been strengthened, and more than 130 county and regional library projects have been organized as the result of the program.

It has also been encouraging to see the States showing a renewed and increased willingness to support their libraries since enactment of the Library Services Act. State funds for the extension and improvement of public library service in rural areas have been increased more than 50 percent since 1956. It is clear that the matching requirement has encouraged State and local governments to efforts they might not have made without this assistance.

Those of us who have watched the operation of the Library Services Act in our own States know what good has, and can continue, to come from it. My own State of Kentucky, for example, has benefited greatly. Many of our rural and even remote communities have been given a long-overdue opportunity to find out what a public library, with or without wheels, can mean to them. Indeed, Kentucky can take great pride in the remarkable progress it has made in developing regional library systems with funds made available under the Library Services Act.

Miss Margaret Willis, of the Kentucky Library Extension Division, with whom I have worked closely in supporting increased funds for the program each year, reported last year:

"A full staff is now giving regional library service in all six regions. These staff members are paid with Library Services Act funds. The books, records, and films are being purchased with Library Services Act funds.

"An intensive educational campaign is going on in these regions to let people know what is being done. It will take time and continued development to sell local communities on the value of considerable local support for these regional libraries."

The tradition of the public library as a "university of the people" is deeply rooted in our American heritage. The public library is a significant force in the educational, social, and cultural life of the community. Adequate library resources provide up-to-date information, inspiration, and profitable use of leisure time. The importance of this kind of self-education in a democratic society can never be overemphasized.

I hope this bill will be passed by the Congress.

DANGER FROM COMMUNISM IN THE CARIBBEAN

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I submit a concurrent resolution, and ask that it be printed at this point in the RECORD and lie at the desk until Thursday of next week so that other Senators may become cosponsors if they so desire.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The concurrent resolution will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the concurrent resolution will be printed in the RECORD and lie on the desk, as requested by the Senator from Connecticut.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 79) was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Whereas intervention by the world Communist movement directly or indirectly in the affairs of any of the independent nations of the Western Hemisphere would threaten the sovereignty and political independence of that nation and other such nations; and

Whereas the free and independent nations of the Western Hemisphere have long since ceased to be objects for domination, control or colonization by other powers; and

Whereas the direct or indirect intervention by the world Communist movement, by whatever means such intervention might be disguised, in any American nation, would constitute in effect such domination, control or colonization by a non-American power, and would violate the sovereignty and political independence of an American nation; and

Whereas any such intervention by the world Communist movement in the affairs of any nation situated in the Western Hemisphere would constitute a threat to the peace and safety of the United States and the other nations of that hemisphere; and

Whereas in the rapidly evolving atomic age the threat presented by any such intervention might develop with such rapidity that there would not be time to assemble a meeting of the Inter-American Organ of Consultation to provide for joint action to repel the danger: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That (a) if one or more of the high contracting parties to the Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance should be threatened in any manner with domination, control or colonization through the intervention of the world Communist movement, any other such party would be justified, in the exercise of individual or collective self-defense under article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations, in taking appropriate steps to forestall such intervention and any domination, control or colonization of any nation of the Western Hemisphere by the world Communist movement.

(b) If any such defensive measures are taken by any defending nation of the Western Hemisphere, such nation should report promptly the action so taken to the Inter-American Organ of Consultation, to the end that an emergency committee, established in the manner provided by the Convention of Havana of 1940, may be organized to provide for the provisional administration of the nation so defended, pending its restoration to a government of the people, by the people, and for the people.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, if the world Communist movement should gain control of one or more nations in the Caribbean, the United States would be in deadly peril. The area to the south of us may be the Achilles heel of our defenses against the U.S.S.R.

Indeed, the existence of Communist bases in the Western Hemisphere might, as suggested by Prof. Samuel Flagg Bemis, distinguished Yale University historian, "tip the balance of power fatally against the United States in the present deadly crisis of power and politics which we call the cold war."

The resolution I have submitted suggests a formula for preventing such a catastrophe.

Its language is based largely on a draft resolution proposed by Professor Bemis in a forceful article in the U.S. News & World Report for December 28, 1959, in which he calls attention to the hazard created by the possibility of Communist penetration of the Western Hemisphere.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article entitled "A Way To Stop the Reds in Latin America," by my distinguished constituent, may be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A WAY TO STOP THE REDS IN LATIN AMERICA

(By Samuel Flagg Bemis)

Prof. Arnold Toynbee—in a recent, 1958, brilliant study of "The Eve of War, 1939"—has called attention to the fact that in 1940 no power was threatened on more than two fronts, east and west, whilst now, 1959, each of the two surviving power groups—U.S.A. and U.S.S.R.—is threatened on three fronts, east, west, and north, "a first-class revolution in international affairs * * * that is not easily grasped or taken into account."

Now suppose the United States should be threatened on all four fronts, including south as well as north, from the Caribbean, as well as the Arctic? Instead of an expansive and friendly ally like Canada stretching for thousands of miles between us and Soviet jet, submarine, and missile bases, with a double line of distant early warning trips, we suddenly become exposed to such bases almost within sight of our southern coastal cities, and right athwart our naval communications from Atlantic to Pacific by the Panama Canal? Would this not tip the balance of power fatally against the United States in the present deadly crisis of power and politics which we call the cold war?

Since 1934, the first line of our defense has shifted from Panama to Europe and Asia. In this geopolitical framework the strategical paths over the Arctic regions have indeed become of more immediate significance than the Caribbean. It has even been argued by some strategists that, in the atomic age, the Panama Canal is no longer a lifeline for the defense of this country; that we could well afford to have it neutralized under an international authority, so great is the danger that one atomic bomb could neutralize—i.e., paralyze—it by knocking it out.

Scarcely anything, short of withdrawal of American forces from Europe and the Asiatic littoral, or the dissolution of NATO (North Atlantic Treaty Organization) or SEATO (Southeast Asia Treaty Organization) would please the Red imperialists more than the neutralization of the Panama Canal or the transfer of its control and defense to the Republic of Panama, like the Suez Canal to Egypt. It would split our present global strategy into a two-ocean strategy and prevent the Panama Canal's being used by the West as a substitute for a blocked Suez Canal, or to relieve the burden on our flagging railway system in case of war.

The Communist conspiracy is on its toes today in Panama trying to dislodge the United States from control of this still-vital American lifeline.

The United States should make it clear to the world that in the Panama Canal Zone it will continue to act as if it were sovereign, as, indeed, it has an explicit treaty right so to do, and to stick beyond any cavil to the military defenses of that waterway.

MORE THAN THE CANAL CAN BE LOST

Much more than the Canal, and all that means to American defense, can be lost. If international communism is allowed to jump the Atlantic and set up a rule in a state of the New World, the way it recently tried to leapfrog over Turkey into Syria and Lebanon, it would mean not only effective neutralization of the hemispheric lifeline in a strategic sense; it would create an active fourth front for the defense of the United States. We simply cannot allow that to happen.

Latin American Communists schooled in Moscow have studied just how to set up their system in the Americas. They tried it once already in Guatemala, while the United States stood by with arms folded around the doctrine of nonintervention, awaiting the uncertain action of a conference of foreign ministers which, thanks only to the counter-revolution of Carlos Armas, never had to meet.

When, finally, the diplomatic doctors did an autopsy on the fallen Arbenz regime in Guatemala, they found the disease of international communism to be far more deep-seated than they had suspected. In fact, it still lingers as a cancer in the body politic of honest liberalism, not only in Guatemala but in all the States of Central America and the Caribbean. It is festering now in Cuba, in Panama, in Venezuela where they spat on Vice President Nixon. The cancer is spreading.

What is there, within the inter-American peace system—pledged as it is to the doctrine of nonintervention—to prevent such a disaster in the New World?

Nonintervention is the keystone of the inter-American peace structure, put into place by the good neighbor policy. In numerous treaties since 1933—subject to honorable denunciation by any of the parties on 1 year's and, in some cases, 2 year's notice—the American Republics have declared inadmissible the intervention of any one of them (1933, 1936) or group of them (1948) directly or indirectly or for whatever reason, within the internal affairs of another American State.

There is, however, one outstanding exception to this sweeping pledge: It does not affect existing treaty obligations. For example, it would not affect the existing treaties of the United States with Panama or Nicaragua by which the United States guarantees the protection of the Panama Canal and the Nicaraguan canal site; it would not affect our treaty with Cuba giving us the naval base at Guantanamo; it would not affect the provisions of the Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance, of Rio de Janeiro, of 1947.

The Rio pact—the first regional alliance of the diplomatic revolution which now binds the United States to defensive alliances today with some 46 countries of the globe—provides for joint intervention, if two-thirds of the American States shall agree to assist in meeting an armed attack against an American State—the group acting within the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense recognized by article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations. The treaty also provides, article 6:

"If the inviolability or the integrity of the territory or the sovereignty or political independence of any American State should be affected by an aggression which is not an armed attack, or by an extracontinental or intercontinental conflict, or by any other fact or situation that might endanger the peace of America, the Organ of Consultation (of the Organization of American States) shall meet immediately in order to agree on the measures which should be taken for the common defense and for the maintenance of the peace and security of the continent."

The Rio Pact of 1947 is the same bond which brought inter-American diplomatic intervention to stop local wars between Haiti and the Dominican Republic, and between Nicaragua and Costa Rica. It is the same bond and principle which animated the meeting of the ministers of foreign affairs last August, in Santiago de Chile, invoked by four Republics, including the United States—that gentle Pan-American huddle which weakly empowered the Inter-American Peace Commission to watch and study military movements in the Caribbean and report to the next (11th) Conference of American States at Quito, Ecuador, in February 1960.

This is the same casus foederis (a case within the provisions of a treaty) to which appeal had been made, upon the insistence of Panama, in the case of Guatemala in 1954, for a meeting of foreign ministers of American States to consider the crisis of Guatemala, but did not meet because of Carlos Armas' successful counterrevolution.

Today it is very doubtful whether the Organization of American States, through its Organ of Consultation, could muster the necessary two-thirds majority of the high contracting parties quickly enough to give a mandate, under the terms of the Rio Pact of 1947, for joint intervention to suppress a Latin-American government gone Communist by infiltration of a popular-front government or capture of a liberal revolution, and thereby threatening the peace and security of the American continent.

It might be tried, but, if it failed, what then?

UNITED STATES CAN EXERCISE THE INHERENT RIGHT OF SELF-DEFENSE

There remains the Monroe Doctrine, which declares that interposition by any European powers to extend their system to any region of this hemisphere is dangerous to our own peace and safety. There remains the inherent right of self-defense, both individual and collective, even if it is not agreed on by a two-thirds majority of American States.

"We owe it [therefore] to candor," pronounced President Monroe in his famous message of December 2, 1823, "and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those [European] powers to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere, as dangerous to our peace and safety—we could not consider any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling in any other manner their destiny, by any European power, in any other light than as a manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States"—which would induce measures on the part of the United States "indispensable to their security."

An important corollary to the Monroe Doctrine since its origin—indeed, a vital dictum of the doctrine since 1869—prohibits the transfer of any colony in the New World from one European sovereign to another—lest such an occurrence upset the balance of power against the security of the United States in this hemisphere.

This no transfer principle has been bound up in the Monroe Doctrine throughout its history. President Grant officially proclaimed it a part of the doctrine in 1869.

A 1940 PRECEDENT FOR ACTION

As Hitler's armies were overrunning Western Europe and threatening to take over French, Dutch, and British colonies in the Western Hemisphere—i.e., Guadalupe, Martinique, Bermuda, the Bahamas, Jamaica, Trinidad, British Honduras, the Guianas, Aruba, etc.—a joint resolution of the U.S. Congress of June 18, 1940, signed by President Franklin D. Roosevelt, implementing the sense of an earlier declaration by a meeting of the Foreign Ministers of the American Republics at Panama in September 1939, at the beginning of the war, stated:

"(1) That the United States would not recognize any transfer, and would not acquiesce in any attempt to transfer any geographic region of this hemisphere from one non-American power to another non-American power; and

"(2) That if such transfer or attempt to transfer should appear likely, the United States shall, in addition to other measures, immediately consult with other American Republics to determine upon the steps which should be taken to safeguard their common interests."

Shortly thereafter, a special conference of foreign ministers of the same Republics, facing the danger of Nazi conquest of Europe and England, gave a mandate to any one or more American Republics, in case of the imminent danger of transfer of colonial territory in the American Continents from one European sovereign to another, to step in and act quickly to forestall such a transfer. A special convention provided for an inter-American committee to administer the government of the rescued region, pending its restoration to its inhabitants upon the return of peace.

But the Havana mandate of 1940 looks only to the actual transfer of an existing colony in America from one European sovereign to another European sovereign. It does not explicitly envisage the case of a European sovereign in fact, if not in name, extending its Communist system to a Republic of the American system a la Guatemala—and will it be a la Cuba, a la Panama, a la Venezuela?

The Pact of Rio of 1947 does anticipate such a "fact or situation" endangering the peace and security of any Republic of the New World, but it requires a two-thirds vote of the 21 Republics to give a mandate to one or more Republics to act in time to stop the danger.

It would be nice if there could issue from the 11th meeting of American states, to meet at Quito, Ecuador, in February 1960, a declaration on the lines of the Act of Havana of 1940, giving a mandate for individual or joint action to prevent the international Communist system of the Old World extending itself to an American state, directly or indirectly, and thereby threatening the peace and security of the American Republics.

It is not known whether our Department of State is endeavoring to put such a business on the agenda for the Quito Conference. It ought to be a major goal of our Government to secure this kind of declaration. Such a proposal, incidentally, would be a touchstone to reveal the degree of Communist power within the various delegations.

However, it is not likely, in the present condition of inter-American relations, that such a declaration would be accepted by even a bare majority of the states—and the emergency may be upon us even before the meeting at Quito next February. Already the Cuban dictatorship has announced its intention to buy jet planes from inside the Iron Curtain.

The dilemma of our Latin American policy today is whether, on the one hand, to interpret the inter-American doctrine of nonintervention so as to permit a non-American power to extend its revolutionary system to the New World by capturing a republic in the Caribbean or Central America, now within easy bombing range of the United States and of the Panama Canal; or, on the other hand, to prepare some anti-interventionist action within the framework of the inter-American peace structure that would really prevent the intervention of international communism. That is: Inter-American intervention to prevent non-American intervention, one horn of the dilemma; or the other horn of absolute nonintervention to permit the intervention of international communism to establish its system in the Western Hemisphere.

LET SOMETHING BE DONE NOW TO DETER COMMUNIST INROADS

In 1940, the Congress acted promptly in the face of the danger arising from the war in Europe. Let it now pass an analogous resolution, to make it clear to our friends and enemies, all over the globe, that this Government is determined within its inherent right of self-defense, and within the purview of the pristine Monroe Doctrine, and indeed of the Pact of Rio and the inter-American peace structure, not to permit the intervention of international communism to endanger the peace and security of the United States, and of all the republics of this hemisphere—indeed, the balance of power for freedom against slavery in the entire globe.

Such a resolution against the intervention of international communism—couched in the language of the Monroe Doctrine, the Rio Pact, and the nonintervention declarations of Washington (1951) and Caracas (1954), and the recent Declaration No. XI of Santiago (1959)—should provide for the administration of the state thus defended or rescued, by the same inter-American authority and machinery set up in the Havana Convention of 1940 for the provisional administration of European colonies and possessions in America threatened by a transfer of sovereignty.

Thus stipulated, there need be no apprehension on the part of our good neighbors that the United States would be reverting to the old system that characterizd the interventions against European imperialist intervention in this hemisphere during the first quarter of our century.

Such a policy would protect the doctrine of nonintervention against the new technique of intervention by international communism, and would do so within the spirit of the inter-American peace and defense treaties. It would not wait for the accomplished fact of a leap of the Communist revolution across the Atlantic to uproot the Monroe Doctrine in the New World, as it has already destroyed the open-door policy in China. By thus assuming the initiative in the New World, we can also defend the global balance of power on which the peace and security of the United States and of our sister republics of America in the world must depend during the coming decade.

WHY WAIT FOR THE BLOWS TO FALL?

It is too much the practice of the United States, in the continuing world crisis of our time, to let the initiative rest with the enemy, to wait for the blows to fall and only then endeavor to improvise some action to fend them off.

Let something be done now, before it is too late, to deter the action. Congress ought, at the beginning of the next session in January, immediately, on the eve of the Quito Conference to pass a joint resolution analogous to that of June 18, 1940, explicitly pointed at the present fact or situation.

If the Quito Conference doesn't back it up, then the United States, acting under the pristine Monroe Doctrine, must do so. The act of faith known as the good neighbor policy, and the freedom of the New World—but, most essentially, the security of the United States and the blessings of liberty invoked in our Constitution—are now at stake.

CEREMONIES IN HONOR OF VETERANS OF WAR BETWEEN THE STATES

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, I submit, for appropriate reference, a resolution in regard to the death of Walter Williams, the last surviving veteran of the War Between the States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BYRD of West Virginia in the chair). The resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The resolution (S. Res. 212) was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

Whereas the Senate has heard with profound sorrow and deep regret the announcement of the death of Walter Williams, the last surviving veteran of the War Between the States; and

Whereas this unhappy event, which occurred on December 19, 1959, marks the symbolic passing of all those who participated in that conflict; and

Whereas that tragic struggle between the States was relieved only by the great courage and gallantry displayed by both sides; and

Whereas it is fitting that the Senate should, on the occasion of the death of the last survivor of the War Between the States, memorialize the deeds of all those whose glory redounds to the credit of the whole Nation and unifies us in our prideful memories: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate, as a mark of respect to the memory of Walter Williams, set apart a day in the near future for the presentation of memorials in honor of all the veterans of the War Between the States and for the holding of such other ceremonies as are deemed appropriate. Such day shall be designated by the President of the Senate after consultation with the majority and minority leaders of the Senate.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, in order that the accounts of the last days of Walter Williams, last surviving soldier of Civil War, may be permanently recorded in our National Archives, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the following newspaper stories and editorials:

From the Washington Post and Times Herald of Sunday, December 20, 1959, a particularly excellent story by Mr. Marshall Andrews, entitled "Rebel Walter Williams, Last Link With Civil War, Is Dead"; and also an article and an editorial from the Washington Post and Times Herald of December 20 and 21, 1959, entitled "Last Veteran of Civil War Dies at 117," and "Second Century After."

From the Dallas Morning News of December 20, 1959, two stories entitled "End of an Era, Old Reb Williams Dies," and "Death Finally Unites Billy Yank and Johnny Reb."

There being no objection, the articles and editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REBEL WALTER WILLIAMS, LAST LINK WITH CIVIL WAR, IS DEAD

(By Marshall Andrews)

Furl that banner, for 'tis weary * * *

It is furled now forever, the starred and barred emblem that flashed through the smoke of battle almost a century ago.

For there's not a man to wave it.

The last of that remarkable army which, under its shadow, earned enough glory for a whole nation is gone. The army is disbanded at last.

When Walter W. Williams died Saturday at Houston, Tex., blind, deaf, and bedridden at 117, the last link with the most impressive and most tragic episode in American history was broken. Of the 4 million men who wore the blue and the grey, he had outlived them all.

Walter Williams was no hero. It is not even clear where and how he served. During his last half-dozen years, when his age and the fact of his survival focused attention on him for the first time in his life, he liked to talk more of his prowess as a deer hunter after the war than of his service for the Confederacy.

He was credited in news reports with perhaps having served in Company C, 5th Texas Cavalry, Hood's Brigade. There was a 5th Texas Cavalry—in fact, there were two of them—but neither was brigaded with that raffish band of daredevils known throughout both armies as Hood's Texicans. Neither, for that matter, served in the Army of Northern Virginia at all.

There was a 5th Texas Infantry regiment in Hood's Texicans, but nobody who followed its flags from Seven Pines to Appomatox would have remembered deer hunting in preference to its bloody and glorious adventures. And there was a 5th Infantry in the Texas State forces, which never left Texas and fought no battles to be remembered.

The internal evidence suggests that he was a member of the 5th Texas Partisan Cavalry, which was used principally on guerrilla service.

Perhaps it is unimportant where Walter Williams served and what he did. Time and his own iron constitution made him a symbol of what they all were and what they all did. He was the last Rebel.

He was a symbol of something never seen before or since on this continent. He was a symbol of a kind and a scale of devotion summed up simply enough by Gen. Robert E. Lee as "unsurpassed courage and fortitude."

Walter Williams was the last of those thousands who bore 4 years of war in a cause few of them bothered their heads about, who fought because it was the only thing a man could do, who called themselves Rebels although they did not hold themselves to be in rebellion.

Much has been written over the years to explain the Confederate soldier and none of it has explained him. Perhaps he cannot be explained. He was trained only in battle, he was well led and he was ill led, he was hungry most of the time, he usually had to take care of himself when he was wounded or sick, he clothed and armed himself from the fat stores of the enemy.

("Just following along behind here," said Gen. N. B. Forrest to a party of recruits who complained that they were unarmed. "We're going to have a fight with them fellows over there and we'll git you some guns.")

He was tall, lean, and unbelievably hairy; he was clean shaven, blond, and dashing. He was as cultured as any man of his generation and he was so illiterate he had to sign with his mark.

He could write from his deathbed: "I am very weak, but I write to you because I know you would be delighted to read a word from your dying son. * * * My grave will be marked so that you may visit it if you desire to do so."

And he could scrawl to a friend even less literate than himself: "I had not a like to a maid out half of yourre words theare is some that I hant maid out yet."

He was profane and the seat of all vices compounded; and his time out of battle could be a long series of prayer meetings. He was impatient of discipline, but he was terrible in battle. Despite his devotion to his nebulous cause, he could not understand why he should not go home to put in a crop when no fighting was imminent—and he often did just that, to the inevitable disorganization of the army.

But with all his faults and all his contradictions he could fight. There was never another soldier quite like him. He could march himself out of his shirt and his shoes, live for weeks on a diet of parched corn, and then go into battle and fight like two of anybody else.

(His diet was so bad that he was afflicted with wholesale night blindness, and he often marched up to battle through the darkness holding onto the belt of the man in front.)

He was devoted to his leaders when they led him well and died for them with blind and futile courage when they led him badly. As to his leaders, he was unfortunate in that he lost so many of the best of them in battle. The toll of company officers was high as always, but the remarkable thing was the price he paid in brigade, division, and corps commanders.

In the Army of Northern Virginia alone, this toll was beyond all reason. Stonewall Jackson and Jeb Stuart both were killed in battle.

James Longstreet was lost to the army in the hour of its utmost travail, terribly wounded in the Wilderness. And before it moved from Petersburg to apotheosis at Appomattox the blood-red battle shirt of A. P. Hill would flame no more along its front.

With his long legs and his rifle, the Confederate soldier gained victories which numbers and circumstances made most improbable, and he took his victories with a fierce pride which led him on to others. He could be defeated, too, and with all his disheartening disadvantages of poor food, wornout clothing, and hand-me-down weapons, he could rebound from defeat as if he had never heard the word.

On their way south from Gen. John B. Hood's annihilating defeat at Nashville, his barefoot troops, marching through the ice of a bitter December composed a lugubrious parody of the popular "Yellow Rose of Texas":

"And now I'm going southward.
For my heart is full of woe,
I'm going back to Georgia
To find my Uncle Joe.
You may sing about your dearest maid.
And sing of Rosalie,
But the gallant Hood of Texas
Played hell in Tennessee."

There was something about him that set him apart from all other soldiers of all armies. He went into battle with a shrill, unearthly yell which became his trademark. He could bring an immense amount of fire to bear with his muzzle-loading musket. His charges were pressed home with a vigor and ferocity which carried him time after time to incredible victories and cost him grievously in victory or defeat. But his drill was execrable and his line of battle would have made the professional soldier of any European army shudder.

(There is evidence of this independence in battle. Col. Walter H. Taylor wrote: "I was wonderfully impressed by the southern soldier and his independent action in battle as contrasted with the mechanical movement of the machine soldier. First one man went forward, then another, then at intervals two or three; then there would be a wavering and falling back when the fire became hot; then there would be a repetition of this; one or two at a time encouraged the others, then small parties advanced, the officers waved their swords and called the men forward and then with a yell the whole line would rush rapidly forward without precision or order, but irresistibly, sweeping everything before them.")

There is nobody living now who remembers the Confederate soldier as he was in his war years. But there are a great many middle-aged men who sat at his knee as little boys and heard from his bearded lips how it was in the great old days. There are many who saw him at his annual reunions in the hot and somnolent southern towns, ancient and feeble, but wearing his gray uniform and brandishing his stick with an air that brought Chancellorsville back again and relegated Appomattox to the limbo where it belonged.

He is gone at last. And perhaps his epitaph was spoken by one of his own, who stood in the last battle line of the Army of Northern Virginia so badly wounded that he could use neither of his arms. His brigade commander rode by, saw him standing there and said:

"What are you doing here? You can't even hold a gun."

"No, sir," the man replied, "but I can still yell."

LAST VETERAN OF CIVIL WAR DIES AT 117—WILLIAMS "PASSES OVER THE RIVER TO REST IN SHADE"

HOUSTON, December 19.—Walter W. Williams, honored as the last surviving veteran of the Civil War, died quietly in the arms of two relatives today.

He simply stopped breathing, worn out after a fourth attack of pneumonia since June.

Death came to the old Confederate—he gave his age as 117—at 4:20 p.m. in the arms of a son-in-law, Ed Bielamowicz, and a grandson, Sydney Boyd.

The President, the Army, and Congress cited him, and historical societies recognized him as the last of the 4 million who fought for the Blue or the Gray.

Williams never fired a shot against the Yankees, although he heard a few, he recalled, when Union troops fired on him one day while he ate breakfast.

Williams was a forager for Gen. John B. Hood's Texas Brigade and later served with Quantrill's raiders.

Texas Governor Price Daniel, using one of Stonewall Jackson's last phrases, said, "Gen. Williams has 'passed over the river to rest in the shade of the trees' with the hundreds of thousands of soldiers in blue and gray who went before him."

Representatives of President Eisenhower, Texas, and a score of other States, both Northern and Southern, are to attend funeral services.

The body will lie in state 48 hours at the Harris County Civil Courts Building. The casket will be draped with the scarlet, blue and white Confederate battle flag which Williams followed. The flag he fought against—the Stars and Stripes—will hang at halfstaff.

Williams first laid official claim to service with the Confederate gray when he applied for a State Civil War pension in 1932. Texas authorities investigated his application and determined that his claim to service was authentic. They granted him a pension.

One newspaperman, Lowell K. Bridwell of the Scripps-Howard newspapers, investigated the records and questioned that Williams served in the Civil War.

But Daniel, Congressmen and descendants of Civil War veterans rallied to support Williams' claims.

SECOND CENTURY AFTER

Those who like to see the epochs of history well rounded out had hoped that Walter W. Williams, the last surviving veteran of the Civil War, might live to complete the full century since Fort Sumter. Death has finally cut him down at the fabulous age of 117 about 15 months short of that goal. In some respects, however, his passing "over the river to rest in the shade of the trees" is even more significant than the centennial will be. For the Civil War has now quite definitely passed from the realm of the living to that of history.

Some question has been raised as to whether Mr. Williams ever wore the gray of the Confederacy. His only claim to have participated in the great American tragedy was that he served in Gen. John B. Hood's Texas Brigade as a forager—that he helped to secure food for the fighting forces. Even this modest assertion has been disputed, but the Government recognized him as a Confederate veteran. In any event, the men in gray are now only a memory. The last of the Boys in Blue, Albert Woolson, was buried in Duluth, Minn., more than 3 years ago.

With them have gone most of the passion and fanaticism that for 4 years drained the Nation's blood. Americans of both the North and South now realize that the separation which came so close to being effected would have been a lasting calamity. Now that a century has healed the wounds of war descendants of the Men in Gray can thank God that their ancestors did not prevail. Yet many of the social and economic problems that grew out of the war are still with us, and in many instances there is still a tendency to view them from the traditionally hostile viewpoints of the North and the South.

Here is the challenge that will pass over into the second post-Civil War century. Now that all the participants on both sides are sharing the equality and peace of the grave, it is time to wipe out the lingering vestiges of passion and prejudice that are rooted in the agony of 1861–65. We are one Nation in honoring the men of both sides who fought and died for what they believed to be right. We need also to have greater unity in finishing the work which they began. It should not take another century to bury the last of the regional antagonisms and prejudices in a common grave with the Blue and the Gray.

END OF AN ERA—OLD REB WILLIAMS DIES

HOUSTON, TEX.—Walter (Old Reb) Williams, honored as the last surviving veteran of the Civil War, died quietly in the arms of two relatives Saturday.

He simply stopped breathing, worn out after a fourth attack of pneumonia since June.

Death came to the old Confederate—he gave his age as 117—at 3:20 p.m. in the arms of a son-in-law, Ed Bielamowicz, and a grandson, Sydney Boyd.

"He just quit breathing," said Bielamowicz. "He had done that before, and we would just lift him up and he'd catch his breath and start breathing again.

"But this time he didn't start breathing again. There was no struggle, no sound, nothing. He just went to sleep."

Dr. Russell Wolfe, his personal physician, visited the old soldier 30 minutes before his death. Although Williams had been ill with pneumonia, the physician said he had recovered from this ailment.

"He said he died from the natural complications of old age," Dr. Wolfe said.

RELATIVES PRESENT

Other relatives present were Mrs. Willie Mae Bowles, at whose home Williams died, and two other daughters—Mrs. Beatrice Bielamowicz and Mrs. Lola Kintz, both also of Houston.

The family decided to hold funeral services Wednesday, in Franklin, Tex., 128 miles northwest of Houston. Williams formerly made his home there. The body will lie in state here Monday and Tuesday.

Prior to the Franklin rites, a service will be conducted at the South Main Baptist Church here at 11 a.m. Wednesday by Dr. E. H. Westmoreland, the pastor. State and military police will then escort the cortege to Franklin.

CITED BY ARMY

Although some persons later questioned whether Williams served in the War Between the States, the President, the Army, and Congress cited him, and historical societies recognized him as the last of the 4 million who fought for the Blue or the Gray.

Williams never fired a shot against the Yankees, although he heard a few, he recalled, when Union troops fired on him one day while he ate breakfast.

Williams was a forager for Hood's Texas Brigade and later served with Quantrill's Raiders.

"What do you mean, 'What is a forager'?" he once replied to a newspaperman.

"I stole food; that's what."

Toward the end he grew blind and deaf and apparently unconscious of happenings around him.

He approached death without struggle. Commenting once on the passing of a Civil War veteran, he said:

"That's one road we are all going to have to travel."

His final illness began December 5 and he grew progressively worse. It was his fourth attack of pneumonia this year, and his doctor said there were complications. He suffered chills and fever.

Texas' Gov. Price Daniel, using one of Stonewall Jackson's last phrases, said, "General Williams has 'passed over the river to rest in the shade of the trees' with the hundreds of thousands of soldiers in blue and gray who went before him."

He served with Gen. John B. Hood's brigade, originally recruited in south central Texas but soon containing troops from many States, for about 5 months. Subsequently, his pension application stated, he spent about 6 months with Quantrill's Raiders before the war ended.

Williams first laid official claim to service with the Confederate gray when he applied for a State Civil War pension in 1932. Texas authorities investigated his application and determined that his claim to service was authentic.

SERVICE CLAIM

At that time he would have been in his late eighties, and a few variations between the facts he gave then and his later stories could be laid to his elderly state.

One newspaperman, Lowell K. Bridwell of the Scripps-Howard group, investigated the records and questioned that Williams served in the Civil War.

By the time the questions arose, the frail, silver-haired Williams lay gravely ill and never appeared strong enough to offer a rebuttal.

But Texas' Governor Daniel, Congressmen, and descendants of Civil War veterans rallied to support Williams' claims. Original records bearing on his service were lost or destroyed when the South crumbled.

Williams was born in Itawamba County, Miss. His later stories placed the date as November 14, 1842.

He joined the Confederate Army in the fading hours of the South's battle. He was 22 at the time.

His pension application stated he joined the army at Blue Mountain, Tenn., a place name that cannot be identified today.

Williams received the title of last survivor with the death of John Salling, of Slant, Va., March 19, 1959, in Kingsport, Tenn. Salling also wore the Gray.

The last Union soldier, Albert Woolson, of Duluth, Minn., died in 1956.

Williams moved to Texas about September 15, 1870, and established a market in Calvert.

SETTLED IN TEXAS

Later he settled on a 20-acre farm at Franklin in south central Texas and traded cattle.

His first wife died a few years after they came to Texas. They had seven children.

Williams then married Miss Ella Mae Holliday, of Franklin, and they became parents of 12 children. He had more than 200 descendants.

His second wife was 31 years his junior. When they both became ill, they moved to the home of Mrs. Willie Mae Bowles, a daughter, in Houston. He died at her home.

Survivors include 5 daughters: Mrs. Bowles, Mrs. Bielamowicz, Mrs. Kintz, and Mrs. Elizabeth Booth, all of Houston, and Mrs. Carrie James, San Antonio; 5 sons: Bud Williams, Macy, Texas; Jack and Eugene Williams, Franklin; Henry, and B. W. Williams, both of Houston; 40 grandchildren; 86 great grandchildren, and more than 100 great great grandchildren.

The second Mrs. Williams died November 2, 1957, after they had been married 64 years.

His deterioration became very evident in November 1958 when he canceled a planned ride in the Veterans Day parade, annual joy to him. But he rallied this year and rode in the Armed Forces Day parade.

"The parade didn't hurt him and it didn't help him," his daughter, Mrs. Bowles, said.

A little later, he suffered a serious bout with pneumonia. Recovering, he underwent a relapse that sapped his little remaining strength. Then he suffered his third and fourth attacks.

In his first attack this fall, doctors despaired of his life. Mrs. Bowles fed him egg, milk, and water with an eyedropper. But still the rugged oldster clung to a thread of life and rallied time after time.

He received $300 a month from the Texas Confederate pension and a special $135.45 pension from the Federal Government.

Williams was a jolly fellow who liked to hunt fox and deer.

His favorite music was hillbilly and western, and as his deafness increased, so did the volume on his record player beside his bed until it resounded through the neighborhood.

But he was spry until near the end and he suffered few illnesses until he was well over 100 by his own calculation of his age.

PLANE RIDER

At 110, doctors pronounced his heart and blood pressure normal. Occasion for the medical test was his first plane ride.

"I'd ride all day if they'd feed me," he said after the flight.

Some of his statements on how to live long:

"I get up for breakfast, turn around for dinner and go to bed after supper and fox hunt for exercise."

"If more of you would get along with your wives better, you'd live a lot longer."

He liked a nip of whisky. "Makes a person eat hearty. But you don't want to be drinking it all during the day."

DEATH FINALLY UNITES BILLY YANK AND JOHNNY REB

(By Robert D. Price)

NEW YORK.—When the Nation observes the centennial of the Civil War, there will be no man alive who truly can say, "I was there."

Walter Williams, last surviving soldier of the Confederacy, died Saturday in Houston. The last Union veteran, Albert Woolson, of Duluth, Minn., died in August 1956; his distinction is commemorated in granite on the battlefield of Gettysburg.

They were the last survivors, for their respective armies, of 4 million men who served for blue or gray. They were the last living links with an era which has been characterized by historians as our supreme national experience. It was an era which has won a place unique in the American heritage. There are many reasons why this has become so, and fact is intermingled with fancy in today's conception of the conflict, but the basic reason must be the deeds and character of the soldiers.

There were only relative trifles of difference between the men of North and South. Both were Americans, they shared the same national traditions, they fought and bled with equal valor. To say that the Civil War was fought by brothers is not idle whimsy.

The great difference was wrought by Appomattox. It is the difference between victory and defeat.

The Union soldier went home to the sound of brass bands and the laurels of the victor. He received a cash bonus—the average was $250—when he was mustered out of service. He speedily gained a powerful spokesman in high places—the Grand Army of the Republic—to argue on his behalf for pensions and for jobs.

The Confederate went home—if he had a home left—as a straggler, afoot and hungry and tattered. He had no government to which to turn for aid. He had no hope of bonus or pension. He was completely and forlornly on his own.

The GAR, founded in the first postwar year, wielded an influence beyond its true power. There was a saying at one time that "the GAR saved the country, now they want it." One of the organization's own historians, Franklin D. Tappan, credited it with "the actual balance of the national political power" for nearly 50 years, even though it never counted more than 32 percent of the Union veterans in its membership.

The symbol of the Confederate soldier, the United Confederate Veterans, was much slower in coming into being. The homecoming southerner's first task was to scratch for a living. The trials of Reconstruction gave him other things to think about. A few State societies sprang up in the passing years but no move was made for a united organization until 1889, when it was discussed at a dinner in New Orleans on Stonewall Jackson's birthday. The first reunion was held in 1890.

The UCV never had any pretensions of political power. It was dedicated to relief work among needy veterans, gathering and preserving the records of the war, cherishing comradeship. It kept an eye on school textbooks and fathered the movement to call the conflict "the War Between the States"—that was about as far as the UCV went in affairs political.

In the relations between the two veterans' organizations, a curious mixture of comradeship and chip-on-the-shoulder feelings developed. On Memorial Day in 1869, U.S. troops guarded Confederate graves in Arlington to make sure that southerners would not decorate them; on the same day, other Union soldiers helped to decorate Confederate graves at Alexandria, Va., a few miles away. A legless Union veteran addressed a UCV reunion at Richmond in 1896 and was "wildly cheered," as the chronicles said, and the GAR supplied an escort for the UCV parade at Washington in 1917.

But, through those same years, several proposals for joint meetings fell down because the southerners wouldn't abide by the restrictions which the GAR sought to impose upon them. As late as 1938, plans for the last North-South reunion at Gettysburg, on the 75th anniversary of the battle, were snagged for a time because a GAR faction refused to let the southerners unfurl their old flags on the field.

All that is history. They fought each other in war and differed with each other in peace, but Billy Yank and Johnny Reb have at last and inevitably become united, in death.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, in connection with these stories I desire at this time to express my appreciation of and commendation for the excellent writing by Mr. Marshall Andrews of the Washington Post and Times Herald in his story of Sunday, December 20, in regard to the passing of the last veteran of the War Between the States. Since I have had, I will say modestly, a little military service and since I have read some volumes in regard to combat activity, I think this is one of the finest descriptions of the combat soldier I have ever seen printed in such a short space in any publication. It is a very fine article.

WITHDRAWAL OF CERTAIN PUBLIC LAND—ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF BILL

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be added as additional cosponsors of S. 2587, a bill to require an act of Congress for public land withdrawals in excess of 5,000 acres in the aggregate for any project or facility of any department or agency of the Government, the names of the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR], the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCNAMARA], and the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

NOTICE OF HEARINGS ON JUVENILE DELINQUENCY

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, during the last session of Congress hearings were held jointly by the Subcommittee on Constitutional Amendments and the Subcommittee To Investigate Juvenile Delinquency on Senate Joint Resolution 116, Senate Joint Resolution 133, and S. 2562, all of which are designed to curb the printing and distribution of pornographic material. A brief hearing on this subject was held in California in November when the Subcommittee To Investigate Juvenile Delinquency was there investigating this and other aspects of the problems within its jurisdiction.

It is the hope of the two subcommittees to conclude their hearings on the two joint resolutions and the bill under consideration on Thursday, January 14, 1960, at 10:30 a.m., in Room 457, Old Senate Office Building. If there are witnesses who desire to testify on these proposed amendments or the proposed bill, they may contact Mr. Bernard Fensterwald, Jr., counsel, Subcommittee on Constitutional Amendments, Room 252, Old Senate Office Building, Capitol 4-3121, extension 5581, or Mr. Arthur Bernstone, counsel, Subcommittee To Investigate Juvenile Delinquency, Room 241, Old Senate Office Building, Capitol 4-3121, extension 2434.

EDITORS SPURRED STATE TO DAIRYLAND FAME

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, as Congress gets underway, we find that we still face perplexing problems in agriculture.

Unfortunately, the farmers and farm organizations have not been able to reach common agreement for a solution. Congress, too, has not been successful in providing all the answers.

Neither has the play of economic forces—except for some commodities—led the way toward a supply-demand balance.

Since this is an election year, the tendency among members of the major political parties, particularly candidates for office, will be to blame the other fellow for the dilemma. Unfortunately, this blame-laying has not as yet been accompanied by recommendations which would provide a final overall solution of the agricultural question.

We recall, of course, that Congress over the years has enacted legislation to shore up the farm economy. Realistically speaking, economic problems cannot be resolved by legislation. Nevertheless, it has been necessary not only to the farm economy but to the whole country, to guard against a recession in agriculture—historically the birthplace of depressions.

Fortunately, the history of U.S. farming, the greatest food-producing plant in the world, contains impressive records of how individuals and other privately sponsored endeavors have made a constructive contribution to our progress.

Today I should like to pay tribute to one such effort which has become an institution in Wisconsin, that is, the publication entitled "Hoard's Dairyman." On January 23, 1960, this outstanding farm paper will celebrate its 75th anniversary. Called the bible of the American dairy farmer, Hoard's Dairyman has chronicled, and made a great contribution to spurring progress in farming in America, particularly in Wisconsin, during its 75-year lifetime.

Among other things, Hoard's Dairyman, as a strong, influential voice in agriculture, has encouraged and stimulated Wisconsin's transition from a great wheat producing State during the Civil War to the adoption of dairying—elevating the Badger State to the No. 1 milk producer in the Nation.

Recently the Milwaukee Journal carried a splendid article by Lewis C. French reviewing the outstanding way in which Hoard's Dairyman has contributed to the progress of dairying in Wisconsin and throughout the country.

Symbolic of the kind of independent pioneering spirit which has made the United States a great country, this spirit—and I have great faith in it—may ultimately provide the answers for our problems in agriculture.

Believing the article reflects the kind of action of which we need more today, I request unanimous consent to have the article printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EDITOR SPURRED STATE TO DAIRYLAND FAME—HOARD'S NEWSPAPER GREW INTO THRIVING CRUSADING MAGAZINE NOW 75 YEARS OLD

(By Lewis C. French)

FORT ATKINSON, WIS.—Hoard's Dairyman, the bible of American dairymen, will be 75 years old January 23.

The swift changes in agriculture, especially the rising tide of dairying in Wisconsin, are recorded from the first issue, a four-page folder. A printer's devil was able to carry that entire issue to the post office under one arm. Now the plant's modern presses roll out 330,000 copies twice a month.

HISTORY IS RECORDED

The pages of the publication record the transformation of Wisconsin from a bankrupt grain State to the Nation's richest dairyland. They chronicle the struggles and triumphs as the Middle West became the Nation's milk jug and began reaching for national and export markets. They show the transition from making cheese and butter in farm kitchens to modern commercial plants. They contain articles on a series of turbulent campaigns to root out diseases that threatened both livestock and humans.

In 75 years, Hoard's Dairyman has had only three editors. Each became a national leader on issues and campaigns that have jolted the dairy world.

William Dempster Hoard, Jr., the general manager, presides over the Hoard family publications. The other is the Jefferson County Union, once a famous weekly and now a bustling daily, which was the genesis of Hoard's Dairyman.

"I WAS SCARED"

The dairy paper has passed from father to son to grandson. William Dempster Hoard, the founder, made Wisconsin supreme in dairying more than any other man.

"You know, I was scared sitting at grandfather's desk when my time came to take the reins," Bill Hoard said recently. "His deeds and accomplishments flashed through my mind. I wondered if I could measure up to the standards of the past."

To understand what Bill Hoard meant one must go back to the pioneering days.

A tall, gangling farm youth of about 14 leaned over the split rail fence on Waterman Simon's farm in Madison County, N.Y., to admire a herd of 50 dairy cows. The boy's father was a circuit riding preacher who earned $400 a year. His grandfather was a God-fearing blacksmith who carried the blood of famous Englishmen. His mother was the best read woman in the county and could tell the best stories.

HE WAS BORN IN 1836

The boy was William Dempster Hoard, who was born in Stockbridge, N.Y., October 10, 1836.

Young Hoard went to work on the Simon farm. He cared for the dairy cattle, learned the art of making butter and cheese.

There was the influence that later changed the agriculture of Wisconsin.

Coming west in 1857 as a young man, Hoard found Chicago a quagmire, Milwaukee a bustling town and made Watertown his first stop. Hoard split rails. He became a singing instructor. He sold pumps for a Waupun factory. He peddled nursey stock.

Acquiring land, the ambitious Hoard jumped into hop raising in the pioneer boom and went broke when the price dropped from 50 cents to 3 cents a pound. It took 20 years before he paid off his debts, right to the last red cent.

CAPITAL WAS $3.50

There were other jobs before Hoard, with $3.50 in capital, a sick wife and three ailing babies, started a weekly newspaper.

He never had set a stick of type in his life. He knew little of advertising or of writing at the time, although he was learned from reading the best books and associating with educated people.

Eventually, Hoard settled his Jefferson County Union in Fort Atkinson, a village of 2,000. At that time the community contained many German Lutherans, a fact that later became important in Hoard's political life. His early weekly was printed half in English and half in German.

In each edition there were three columns or more about dairying. Hoard became known as the cow editor, first in derision in the political campaigns, later in top level national respect.

INSECTS RAVAGED FIELDS

E. D. Coe, who was doing right well publishing the Whitewater Register, saw the interest in the dairy columns and urged Hoard to start a dairy publication.

Under the influence of the Civil War, Wisconsin was a great wheat State. After the war, clouds of insects ravaged the wheatfields.

The settlers were helpless. They had grown wheat so long on the same land that the soil was tired and easily eroded.

Between the two, Wisconsin agriculture was hanging on the ropes. Settlers began moving west to new lands.

Hoard wrote that the story of the decline in Wisconsin farming was warned of by Abraham: "Wheat robs the soil and cattle drop fatness."

HE WAS BOOSTER

The value of using cattle to heal the soil's wounds caused by grain cropping, a technique Hoard learned back in Madison County, N.Y., was applied. Milk replaced wheat in Wisconsin, but it was an uphill struggle.

The doughty editor never stopped boosting the dairy cow and her products. The chinch bug panic gradually was forgotten; green pastures healed the scars.

If there was one thing that W. D. Hoard kept in the forefront of his writing and speechmaking it was a statement that still is the keynote of Hoard's Dairyman:

"The cow is the foster mother of the human race. From the day of the ancient Hindu to this time, the thought of men turned to the kindly and beneficent creatures as one of the chief sustaining forces of human life."

FARMERS PAID ATTENTION

Farmers began to pay attention. They brought in eastern and imported dairy cattle to replace the dual purpose cattle of the pioneers. Wisconsin began to produce more butter and cheese than it could consume, to reach out for new markets.

The crusading cow editor soon attracted attention.

He was shoved into being a candidate for Governor after dabbling in local political affairs and won in 1888. In his administration the first laws were passed to make honest men out of milk processors, to prohibit the substitution of vegetable oils for butter fat and adulteration. Then a dairy and food commission was established to protect consumers.

SCHOOL ISSUE BEATS HIM

But Hoard got tripped up on a school issue. German settlers led by arrogant Prussians seemed determined to make Wisconsin a duchy of the fatherland. The legislature passed and Governor Hoard backed the Bennett law, which did two things. It required youths 7 to 14 years old to attend school and be taught English at least 12 weeks a year.

Those in favor of parochial schools were enraged. The count showed there were 129 schools where no effort was being made to teach English.

Hoard was defeated on the school issue by George W. Peck of Milwaukee. Hoard died in 1918.

Dairy leaders still agree no one man did more to build dairying than the cow editor of Fort Atkinson. His portrait hangs in the Saddle and Sirloin Club at Chicago—the highest honor in American agriculture. More recently, popular subscription put a bronze statue of W. D. Hoard on the University of Wisconsin campus.

DEATH OF FORMER SENATOR RUFUS C. HOLMAN, OF OREGON

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, I wish to note here today the death of the Honorable Rufus C. Holman, of Portland, Oreg., who served with distinction in the U.S. Senate from 1939 until 1945.

Senator Holman was born in Oregon on October 14, 1877. He died on November 27, 1959, while spending the Thanksgiving weekend with members of his family. He was an illustrious native son of Oregon, and the people of the State have mourned his passing.

On December 2, 1959, funeral services were held in memory of Senator Holman at the Riverview Cemetery Chapel near Portland. Mrs. Neuberger and I attended the services which were conducted with eloquence and simplicity by the Right Reverend Benjamin D. Dagwell, of the Episcopal Church, retired Episcopal bishop of the Pacific Northwest. Bishop Dagwell spoke movingly of Senator Holman's many great services to his State and Nation, of the Senator's love for the majestic outdoors of Oregon, and of his devotion to his family and friends.

STATE HONORS FORMER SENATOR

John Carpenter, of the staff of KOIN-TV, was the soloist at the Holman funeral and Goldie Pos was the organist. Pallbearers were the eminent nephews of Senator Holman, Dr. Charles N. Holman, of the University of Oregon Medical School; Circuit Judge Ralph Holman, of Clackamas County; Herbert Malarkey; Thomas W. Holman; Harold Burkitt, Jr.; Charles Pumphrey; and Donald Holman.

Concluding services were conducted by the Willamette Lodge of the Masonic Order, with which Senator Holman was long affiliated. The Reverend W. Sherman Burgoyne, retired minister of the Methodist Church, read these impressive and solemn rites. Senator Holman's last resting place is in the Riverview Cemetery, overlooking the Willamette Valley and Mount Hood of eternal snows, in his beloved Oregon.

Not long before his death, Senator Holman was honored by the Military Department of the State of Oregon, which presented to him its Oregon Distinguished Service Medal. The late Maj. Gen. Thomas E. Rilea awarded the citation, and this citation was read by Bishop Dagwell as a part of the funeral oration on December 2. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the citation appear in full in the RECORD at this point in tribute to former Senator Rufus C. Holman.

There being no objection, the citation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF OREGON,
MILITARY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE ADJUTANT GENERAL,
Salem, Oreg.

By direction of the Governor of the State of Oregon, and pursuant to action of the decorations board, announcement is made of the award of the Oregon Distinguished Service Medal to Senator Rufus C. Holman.

Senator Rufus C. Holman, of the State of Oregon, has performed exceptionally meritorious and distinguished service in peace and in war as a member of county, State, and National bodies of the Government of the United States over a long period of years.

Senator Holman began his long career of public service as a member of the Board of County Commissioners of Multnomah County in 1912. In 1921 he returned to private enterprise where he continued tirelessly to work behind the scenes in the development of our State government. Above and beyond this, Senator Holman, at that time, realized the necessity for a strong defense.

As State treasurer of Oregon from 1932 to 1939 the thought was constantly in his mind of building up the Oregon National Guard and the national defense.

As a Member of the U.S. Senate from 1939 to 1945 and acting in important assignments of Committee on Appropriations and concurrently with service on the Military Affairs Committee, his voice was heard unceasingly and unfalteringly in demanding more adequate appropriations and promoting the necessity of the advancement of preparedness for the eventuality that he so clearly visualized. Notwithstanding the fact Senator Holman was a member of the minority party, his outstanding ability indicated and dictated his assignment to these important committees which meant so much, not only to the National Guard, but the Military Establishment of the United States in its entirety.

As a result of his outstanding leadership and contribution to community, State, and Nation, the Oregon Distinguished Service Medal is awarded to Senator Rufus C. Holman.

By order of the commander in chief:

THOMAS E. RILEA,
Major General, the Adjutant General.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, former Senator Holman had many devoted friends among his colleagues in the U.S. Senate, and some of them still serve here. They will want to know that the Senator's gracious widow, Mrs. Norma Holman, still lives in Portland in a lovely home among the wooded hills of Portland Heights. Senator Rufus C. Holman dearly loved his native State. This is why he returned to Oregon after his defeat for renomination in the 1944 primaries, rather than choosing to stay as a resident of Washington, D.C., which so many ex-Senators frequently decide to do.

My State and Nation are the richer for the outstanding career of Senator Rufus C. Holman. They are the poorer for his passing. Senator Holman was our friend and neighbor in Portland, and we often walked over to their home to spend a few moments over teacups before a roaring hearth fire.

Senator Holman was a vigorous supporter of efforts to develop fully the vast power potential of the waterways of the Pacific Northwest, a cause which has meant much in terms of economic betterment, not only to the entire West, but also to the Nation.

I salute his memory in these brief remarks in the Senate Chamber where he spent so many happy and fruitful hours. Although he and I were members of different political parties, there was a warm personal friendship between us. I shall forever be grateful for the courage and rectitude which impelled him to cross party lines in 1954 and to endorse me for election to the Senate. I trust that I shall always prove worthy of this bipartisan support which I received from an illustrious native son and public servant of Oregon and of the United States, the late Senator Rufus C. Holman.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NEUBERGER. I am very happy to yield to the distinguished Senator from Georgia.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I wish to associate myself with the remarks the distinguished Senator from Oregon has made about the late Senator Rufus C. Holman. I had the privilege of serving with the late Senator from Oregon. I have never known a more earnest man in his desire to serve the people of his State and his country.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, I appreciate the remarks of the eminent Senator from Georgia, particularly because I know that, in his service in the Senate, Senator Holman took the greatest pride in his membership on what was then known as the Military Affairs Committee, where he was associated with his colleague, the able senior Senator from Georgia.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, my colleague, the distinguished junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER], has just made a very fine statement concerning the Honorable Rufus C. Holman, former Senator from Oregon, who died a short time ago.

It is a sad loss to our State that a dedicated public official, Rufus C. Holman, has passed away. He was my opponent in 1944. After a vigorous but fair campaign, I was elected. To demonstrate the fine character and the fair sportsmanship of this man, I should like to have the RECORD show that upon my arriving in Washington, he called at my office, and we had a long and very friendly discussion which started a very warm friendship that lasted over the years, up to the very time of his death. In fact, Senator Holman and I corresponded with great frequency during those years.

In 1956, he was confined in a Portland hospital for a short period of time, and on a visit to him at the hospital, he informed me that he had, prior to my coming, advised the press that although he was a Republican he was endorsing me for reelection as a Democrat in 1956.

He was helped time and time again by his very gracious and able wife, the former Mrs. Lundeen.

As I have said to the people of my State, I say to the Senate today, Oregon has lost a fine citizen, whose most notable contribution in public affairs, in my opinion, was in the field of natural resources. The fact that we saw eye to eye on that great issue was the reason he gave for endorsing me in 1956.

Rufus Holman, during his years of service at the State level, in his capacity as treasurer of the State of Oregon, was one of the men we could always count upon in the great battles for the development of the water resources of the West for the benefit of the people, rather than for the selfish profit dollars of the private utilities.

In behalf of Mrs. Morse and myself, I wish to say that we regret very much the passing of this truly outstanding Oregonian.

MRS. TALMADGE, BUSINESSWOMAN OF 1959

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, the Members of this body are well familiar with the distinguished record of my friend and colleague, the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. TALMADGE] in the field of public service.

But some may not be aware that his beautiful and charming wife, Betty, not only is a helpmate and political adviser to her husband but has established a highly successful career in her own right in the field of business and commerce.

Mrs. Talmadge is the operator of a growing business in the production and marketing of an exceedingly delectable brand of cured ham which has achieved a national—and even international—reputation under the trademark of "Talmadge Hams."

This is no sideline or hobby for Mrs. Talmadge. It is a vigorous and growing business in a highly competitive field. To those who have feasted on Betty Talmadge's ham, nothing need be said about the culinary perfection of her product.

Mrs. Talmadge directs her highly successful business with all the charm and grace of the lovely southern lady that she is. Nor has she permitted her activities in the world of business to interfere in any way with her duties as the wife of a very busy man and her responsibilities as the mother of two active young boys. Furthermore, she has always found time in her busy life to take an active interest in civic and community affairs, thus marking her as a useful and valuable citizen.

Mr. President, I am delighted to be able to state that Mrs. Talmadge has just been selected as woman of the year in business in Atlanta, Georgia's capital city. A more logical choice for such well deserved recognition and honor could not have been found than the wife of our friend and colleague.

In announcing its choice for the honor, the selection committee had this to say about Betty Talmadge:

Mrs. Talmadge is more than a successful businesswoman. The mother of two children, she long has been prominent in local and State politics. She is both brilliant and charming. She is unusually able as a woman in business, yet also has those qualities of grace, humor, family dedication, and feminine charm that make her truly a woman of the year in the finest meaning of that honor.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the body of the RECORD two newspaper accounts of Mrs. Talmadge's selection as Atlanta's woman of the year in business. The first is from the Atlanta Constitution of January 6 and the second is from the Atlanta Journal of January 5.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Atlanta Constitution, Jan. 6, 1960]

MRS. TALMADGE NAMED BUSINESSWOMAN OF 1959

(By Marjory Rutherford)

Mrs. Herman (Betty) Talmadge, busy wife of a U.S. Senator and former first lady of Georgia, is Atlanta's 1959 woman of the year in business.

The pretty young blond mother of two sons, whose thriving ham business at the Talmadges' farm home near Lovejoy has brought her fortune and international fame, will be honored with women in four other fields at annual woman of the year recognition dinner at the Piedmont Driving Club January 26.

A committee headed by James P. Furniss pointed out that Mrs. Talmadge is a "successful entrepreneur * * * with keen business sense."

Betty Talmadge, who married at 18, admittedly "didn't know a debit from a credit" when she began her unusual business venture.

In 1952 she bought 200 hams on credit from a local packinghouse. She put her husband and others on their 2,600-acre farm to work rubbing a special curing formula into the hams.

Today she employs 23 workers and reports annual ham sales nearing the 100,000 mark. Products of the Lovejoy farm go to 24 States and several foreign countries. (Mrs. Talmadge is especially proud of those sold in the gourmet capital of Paris, France; she herself approached a source there "when I went over with HERMAN last summer.")

When Congress is in session, Betty Talmadge still manages to return to Georgia to spend 5 to 7 days out of each month supervising the Lovejoy operations. She is prouder of a wonderful new stainless steel ham-curing plant than most women are of a new house.

She brushes up on her bookkeeping with courses at a Washington college while her husband is busy in Congress.

But Furniss observed "she is both brilliant and charming. Unusually able as a woman in business, she has also the qualities of grace, humor, family dedication, and feminine charm."

The unassuming Mrs. Talmadge said of her latest honor, "It's pretty breathtaking for a smalltown girl from Ashburn. Everybody likes attention, and I'm as human as the next person."

Other members of the committee naming the woman of the year in business are Roy A. Dorsey, Walter B. Elcock, Jr., Robert L. Garges, Neal Irby, Arthur L. Montgomery, and James T. Porter.

Colonial Stores, Inc., is sponsoring this year's woman of the year event, with President Joseph Seitz as woman of the year chairman. Reservations for the dinner may be made by telephoning Mrs. Jack N. Norris, Jr., TR. 6-2167.

WORKING WIFE—MRS. TALMADGE BUSINESSWOMAN OF THE YEAR

(By Edwina Davis)

The working wife of a U.S. Senator, Mrs. Herman (Betty) Talmadge, is Atlanta's woman of the year in business.

Mrs. Talmadge organized and operates a thriving Talmadge ham business at Lovejoy, near Atlanta. In 1952 she bought 200 hams on credit from a local packinghouse. Then she put her husband, her maid, and others to work rubbing a special formula of salt, sugar, and spice into the hams. The first Talmadge hams went into Atlanta restaurants in the early summer and were an immediate success.

Business has increased until the workers number 23 and annual ham sales approach 100,000.

"When I first started out in the business, they used to kid me that I didn't know a debit from a credit and made the books balance by force," the vivacious entrepreneur said smiling.

Few, if any, would make that mistake now. Mrs. Talmadge is a proven success as a businesswoman. Furthermore, she has brushed up on her bookkeeping through courses in Washington, D.C., while her husband was busy in Congress. Her college training at the University of Georgia was in home economics. She quit school in her sophomore year to get married.

Mrs. Talmadge is one of five women in different fields of endeavor to be honored at the annual WOTY (woman of the year) recognition banquet at 7:30 p.m. Tuesday, January 26. Reservations for the banquet may be made by calling WOTY's secretary, Mrs. Jack C. Norris, Jr., TR. 6-2167.

Colonial Stores, Inc., is sponsoring this year's event, with President Joseph Seitz as trophy chairman.

Members of the all-male committee that chose Mrs. Talmadge are James P. Furniss, chairman; Roy A. Dorsey, Walter B. Elcock, Jr., Robert L. Garges, Neal Irby, Arthur L. Montgomery, and James T. Porter.

Learning of her selection, Mrs. Talmadge said: "I don't know that I deserve the honor, but I certainly like receiving it. Everybody likes attention and I'm as human as the next person."

In announcing its selection, the committee said: "Mrs. Talmadge is more than a successful businesswoman. The mother of two children, she long has been prominent in local and State politics.

"She is both brilliant and charming. She is unusually able as a woman in business, yet also has those qualities of grace, humor, family dedication, and feminine charm that makes her truly a woman of the year in the finest meaning of that honor."

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE RICHARD M. SIMPSON, OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, it is my sad duty to announce to the Senate the untimely death this morning of our friend—and I am sure that all who knew him regarded him as a friend—the Honorable RICHARD M. SIMPSON, of the 18th Congressional District of Pennsylvania, who passed away at the hospital after a brief illness.

DICK SIMPSON, with whom I served in the House for 16 years, represented the 18th Congressional District of Pennsylvania, during most of that time with practically no opposition. He represented the counties of Bedford, Franklin, Fulton, Huntingdon, Mifflin, Snyder, Somerset, and Union.

DICK SIMPSON was born on August 30, 1900, in Huntingdon, Pa. He graduated from the University of Pittsburgh and obtained his law degree from the Georgetown Law School.

He married Grace Metz, who died in March of 1945. He had two daughters by this marriage, Susan and Barbara.

He was a member of the Pennsylvania House of Representatives, representing Huntingdon County for two terms, from 1935 to 1937.

Subsequently he married Mae J. Cox, whose sons are James, Edward, and Joseph Cox. They had a daughter, Kay Josephine.

DICK SIMPSON served in the House since May 11, 1937, and at the time of his death was the ranking minority member of the Committee on Ways and Means. He was also for many years chairman of the Republican congressional campaign committee.

He was a good friend, a devoted legislator, and an able, conscientious citizen. He was a loving father and good husband. His district and the State of Pennsylvania mourn his passing, which is a matter of grief and sadness and sorrow to all of us. I make this statement for the information of the Senate. As of this moment I have no information as to details with respect to the time of the funeral, or other matters. We will learn those details later.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, during my service in the Senate it has been my extreme honor and pleasure to have served as chairman of the Republican senatorial campaign committee during the same tenure of office of Representative SIMPSON on a similar committee in the House.

I have always had great respect and admiration for DICK SIMPSON, who, while he devoted his activities in large part to the work of the Republican Party, nevertheless held first in his heart his service to America. In his passing, all of us, not only Congress and the Republican Party, but all America, have suffered a great loss, because dedicated patriots such as DICK SIMPSON are not around in as great profusion as they used to be. I express my extreme regret and sorrow at the passing of this gentleman and fine American.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I desire to pay my tribute to DICK SIMPSON, with whom I served for 8 years in the House of Representatives. He was a noble gentleman, a highly patriotic American, as considerate in his disagreements as in his agreements. He rendered outstanding and distinguished service to his people and his country, and I join in expressing my great respect for him and in honoring his memory today.

I regret deeply that DICK SIMPSON has been taken from us at so relatively young an age, considering the advances of modern medicine.

I join with his family in their sorrow upon his death.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, the passing of DICK SIMPSON comes as a real shock. Sometimes one can only inadequately express a sense of shock, distress, and bereavement, and this is such an occasion. The death of DICK SIMPSON marks the passing of an old friend.

I recall when I first served with him in the House of Representatives. I remember also when both of us were vice chairmen of the National Republican Congressional Committee. Together we were engaged in legislative service over a quarter of a century.

I developed a deep esteem and affection for him. If there was one attribute which he had more than any other, it was his amazing and refreshing candor. Candor is, after all, nothing more than a reflection of conviction and inner truth. He spoke his mind and let his spirit utter what was there, freely and without inhibition.

I set him down long ago as one of the great patriots, one of the great Americans, for he served his country, his State, and his constituency well in the whole legislative field.

Fortunately, in all the trying days of his illustrious service, he had the benefit of the advice and counsel of his helpmeet and companion, Mae Simpson, who is by all odds one of the finest persons I have ever known. She, too, had something of the political flair. What a great team they were as they went about the country seeking the welfare of the Nation.

So, truly, we can say today that there is a void, difficult to fill, as a great citizen and a great statesman takes the long and eternal journey.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, the sense of loss and shock I experience at the death of DICK SIMPSON is a little difficult to express. DICK SIMPSON came to the 75th Congress, of which I was a Member, in the first year I was a Member of the Congress. As I recall, it was in the spring of 1937 that he was elected to fill a vacancy in his district of Pennsylvania, so his service in Congress has been of practically the same length as mine.

I have thought this morning of the impression he made upon the House of Representatives in 1937. The Republican membership in the House at that session was at a low ebb; in fact, that was the alltime low for Republicans in the House of Representatives. But when DICK SIMPSON came to the House he brought to his Republican colleagues the encouragement of a man battling on the hustings, carefully working his way, and being elected under the difficult circumstances of those days. He soon made his mark in the House of Representatives as a studious, calm person, who could, when aroused, give vent to strong convictions. But he was a man of balance, a man of judgment, and he soon commanded the respect he has held through the years since that time.

Congress and the Nation can ill afford to lose a man of his character, his intelligence, his devoted patriotism, and his fine sense of cooperation with other persons.

I express to Mrs. Simpson, on behalf of Mrs. Case and myself, our deep sympathy.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, I should like to associate myself with the expressions of sympathy and tribute in connection with the death of our colleague in the other body, Hon. RICHARD M. SIMPSON.

During my service in the House of Representatives I always considered him to be one of the more conscientious and hard-working Members of that body. He had deep-seated convictions about the theories and principles of government. He was articulate and persistent in expressing his convictions, both as a member of his political party and as a Member of Congress. He served and represented well not only his district and his State, but the entire country. He will be greatly missed. His contribution has been a vast and many-sided one. He had entered and had become interested in many fields of legislative activity.

I join in the expressions of sympathy to the survivors of the late Representative RICHARD M. SIMPSON.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I rise to express my sorrow at the death of Representative RICHARD SIMPSON, of Pennsylvania. We have lost one of our most distinguished colleagues.

It was my privilege to serve in the House of Representatives with Representative SIMPSON for a period of 16 years. For 10 years we served together on the Committee on Ways and Means. He was my personal friend, and my leader in many things.

I admired the man. He possessed great qualities of character. He had an outstanding mind, and he was genuinely patriotic. He was of excellent Christian character.

We have lost a fine and outstanding and helpful member of the legislative branch of our Government.

I wish to extend to Mrs. Simpson and his children and his other relatives my most sincere sympathy.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, it is with a deep sense of sorrow and of loss that I have received the news of the passing of Representative RICHARD M. SIMPSON, of Pennsylvania. Since his election to the 75th Congress in 1937, DICK SIMPSON has been an eminently able Member of Congress. He was endowed with great energy and a personal warmth of feeling which will be cherished by all those of us who were privileged to be associated with him.

I was happy to work closely with DICK SIMPSON during my tenure in the House of Representatives. One of his characteristics which particularly appealed to me, as it did, I think, to most of us, was his broadminded attitude toward those who might disagree with him on this, that, or the other issue. It in no way affected his close personal friendship or his willingness to work shoulder to shoulder on matters on which there might be complete agreement.

I was always impressed by DICK SIMPSON'S high spirit of dedication, which he brought to every public question which commanded his attention.

He was a man of heart and a man of character. His Nation, as well as his district and his State, shares with his wife, his family, and his friends in their great and irreparable loss.

TRIBUTES TO THE LATE REPRESENTATIVES HUBERT S. ELLIS AND WILL E. NEAL

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, following the conclusion of the 1st session of the 86th Congress, and during the adjournment prior to our meeting here on yesterday, West Virginia felt the impact of sadness as a result of the passing of two former Members of the U.S. House of Representatives, Hubert S. Ellis and Will E. Neal. These Representatives, both of whom served from the Fourth District of my State, were members of the Republican Party. One, Mr. Ellis, was a respected business leader. The other, Dr. Neal, was a beloved physician. When both of these citizens came into the forum of public affairs on Capitol Hill, they brought a sense of responsibility, a diligence of effort, and a devotion to constituency. Today, in remembrance, I speak as a former colleague of the late Representative Ellis, and I believe that the esteemed present occupant of the chair, my colleague from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD], who served with Representative Neal, would wish to join me in expressing this belief.

West Virginia had, in these Representatives in the Congress of the United States, men worthy of the trust to which they were committed.

DEATH OF WILLIAM C. HULL, EXECUTIVE ASSISTANT TO U.S. CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSIONERS

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, a few days ago, the Civil Service Commission, Congress, and the Nation lost a dedicated and loyal public servant, William

C. Hull, executive assistant to the U.S. Civil Service Commissioners, who died of a heart attack on December 23, 1959, at the age of 68. A longtime career civil servant, Mr. Hull had served in the post of executive assistant to the Commissioners since October 1917.

It was my special pleasure and privilege to work with Mr. Hull on many occasions, and I always found him most cooperative, helpful, and friendly, and highly competent.

Mr. Hull entered Federal service with the Patent Office on September 18, 1908, but after 3 weeks on October 5, 1908, he started work as a messenger for the Civil Service Commission at $30 a month. During his more than half a century at the Commission, Mr. Hull served under 30 of the 48 Civil Service Commissioners in the administrations of 9 Presidents. He celebrated his golden anniversary in Federal service in September 1958.

In the course of his long and capable service, Mr. Hull received many commendations on his work from legislative and executive officials. He was frequently consulted by Members of Congress and high-ranking department and agency officials, as well as by union and veterans' groups because he had observed at first hand most of the important events in the Commission's history.

During more than a half century of distinguished civilian service to his country, many tributes came to William C. Hull. The most recent to honor him were the AMVETS, who voted him their Civil Servant of the Year Award at their national convention on September 11, 1959. In citing him as an outstanding career civil servant, AMVETS echoed many others in praising Mr. Hull for meriting the respect and confidence of congressional leaders, Government officials, civic groups, and the public.

His long and successful record of Federal service was complemented by his equally distinguished record in community affairs. His sense of civic responsibility was reflected by his years of activity for his friends and neighbors.

William C. Hull was a great American, a loyal public servant, and a true friend. We will miss him.

Mr. President, I point to the unselfish career of Mr. Hull as a guide to be followed by other civil servants of the Government, of whom many are dedicated and outstanding in their service. I point to Mr. Hull's fine record as an inspiration and a guide to the younger men and women in this great group of important, necessary, dedicated public officials.

JUVENILE DELINQUENCY CONTROL PROBLEMS

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BYRD of West Virginia in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (S. 694) to provide Federal assistance for projects which will demonstrate or develop techniques and practices leading to a solution of the Nation's juvenile delinquency control problems.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONDITIONS IN PERU—ADDRESS BY SEÑORA MIRIAM KROPP DE BELTRÁN

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, on October 10, 1959, Señora Miriam Kropp de Beltrán, distinguished wife of the able Prime Minister of Peru, Pedro G. Beltrán, delivered an address at the Hispanic-American Forum of Stanford University.

In a most charming and original fashion, Señora Beltrán provides in her speech penetrating insights into the life of the great neighbor Republic of Peru and wise observations on its relations with the United States. Because of the great interest of the Senate in inter-American relations, I ask unanimous consent that the text of Señora Beltrán's remarks may be included at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF MIRIAM KROPP DE BELTRÁN, HISPANIC-AMERICAN FORUM, STANFORD UNIVERSITY, OCTOBER 10, 1959

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I feel very honored to be asked to represent Peru, a country I love so much, at Stanford University where I spent four of the happiest years of my life. Twice I have been asked to speak on Peru. The first time was about a dozen years ago, when the chairman of the Junior League section on Latin America introduced me thus: "Today we are going to hear about Peru. We had invited Marion Sproul, the daughter of the distinguished president of you-know-what university—the University of California. She wasn't able to be with us, and so Miriam will take her place." Today, it was my husband who was invited to give this speech—and here I am again.

I couldn't begin to tell you of all of the developments in Peru in the last 10 years in the time allotted me. I shall make this talk as short as possible, and invite questions from the floor.

Let me begin by discussing journalism in Peru, as that is the subject with which I am most acquainted. Our paper is called La Prensa, not to be confused with its big sister, La Prensa of Buenos Aires, whose editor, Mr. Alberto Gainza Paz, was president of the Interamerican Press Association during its recent reunion in San Francisco. I shall try to be modest about my remarks on our La Prensa, but I happen to think it is the greatest newspaper in South America. And speaking about being unbiased and objective, objective, nonslanted reporting was unheard of in Peru, until La Prensa initiated it. In a country, one of whose beauties is precisely the passion and volatility of its people, it has been a very difficult job to instill in a newspaperman the necessity of the to-the-point and impersonal approach to news reporting. Too often one used to read in the lead paragraph of how a reporter, taking pencil in hand, leaves the paper on a journalistic assignment, dwells on the beauty of his walk to the apartment house where he has been told he could find a story, and climbs the stairs to find the most prominent political figure in the community murdered by a beautiful and exotic agent of an unfriendly foreign power. We have tried hard and successfully to combat this type of thing. La Prensa is now, of course, a shining example of objective reporting. A recent issue carried a two-column story on the first page, whose headline read: "En La Universidad de Stanford Hablara la Sra. de Boltran." While buried in the same edition on page 23 was the world-shaking news, "Medias Blancas de Chicago Derratoron a Dogers 11 a 0."

Some years ago there was no proper society page in any paper in Lima. Society notes were included among local news items, and were devoted to such gems of information as "Today is Mrs. So and So's birthday, but she will not receive her friends." Other local papers had, and one still does, blacklists, on which you would be put if the publisher didn't like you. Socially, you were dead. One of the more amusing manifestations of this phenomenon occurred in Bogota some years ago. The daughter of Mr. Alberto Lleras Camargo, now Colombia's brilliant President, was about to be married, and a Colombian newspaper in the opposite political camp announced her engagement, noting she was the daughter of her mother, but not mentioning her father among her relatives. Today in Lima we have a newsy, lively society page. Moreover, the other papers have copied us. Also, we were the first to introduce a women's page. For the women of South America, contrary to a common misbelief, are leading active and useful lives in their communities, and some also take part in politics. For example, Peru has outstanding women members in its Congress.

Perhaps the most significant change in Peru since I have known it is that there now exists public opinion. Again, modesty prevents my going into details as to what has brought this about. The mission of a daily in a country where the paper is not only the chief source of information on the day's news, but also takes the place of books and magazines among a people too poor to buy them, is a serious and responsible one. In Latin America the editorial page is much more important than it is here, for it must teach certain basic truths to people who have not had the opportunity of being exposed to much formal instruction. The man in the street has a remarkable thirst for knowledge, and the recent emergence of a middle class is one of the happiest facts in Peru, and argues well for the future of that country. There the average man does not merely glance over his paper at the breakfast table and then depend on the radio, TV, and magazines to add to the sum of his knowledge of world events. He reads his paper thoroughly, and once finished finds it to be in great demand among his friends. For in many cases the cost of a newspaper represents a substantial item in his daily budget. I'm certain that the number of readers per person per paper in Latin America must be about five times higher than it is here.

I must hurry along, for many distinguished speakers follow me, who I am sure have a much more important message to give you. But let me cite one example of what I mean about the educational value of the editorial page. Here at Stanford I majored in social science. But I learned the true nature of inflation and its disastrous effect upon the poor only by living in a country where its results have been so obvious. Our paper has carried on for years an intense campaign against this evil, as well as an educational program to explain exactly its nature and its causes—a campaign sometimes accused of being repetitive and monotonous. Today, few readers in Peru are unacquainted with this problem, and the means of overcoming it, which—reduced to the simplest terms—is to try to live within one's budget and stop printing notes. But let me not dwell too long on this subject. There is a saying in Spanish: "Cada loco con su teme," and this is a favorite and recurring theme on our editorial page.

You would probably be amused, and more amused than pleased, about certain newspaper practices in Peru. There are practically no libel laws in that country, and those which exist are never put into effect. At least, I cannot remember one case where the plaintiff in a libel suit has won a case. Freedom of the press in Peru is carried to an extreme unheard of in this country. Glaring headlines call for the overthrow of the Government, qualify members of the Congress as traitors to their country, and sold to foreign interests. But such liberty has not always been the case. Under the last government, 250 assault troops attacked La Prensa and jailed my husband. They had intended to apprehend only him, but the members of his staff who were still in the building (it was 2 o'clock in the morning) surrounded their boss, and wouldn't let the police get near him. Later they forced their way into the penitentiary with him, to the dismay of the warden, who had but one bed ready. One of the first acts of the Prado government, after taking office as the result of a democratic election that not even its most bitter opponents could claim was fraudulent, was to guarantee freedom of the press in Peru.

Peru is one of the countries in South America where there has never been any real anti-American feeling. You may be surprised by that statement, for many of you will recall that Mr. NIXON had a few stones thrown at him during his stay in Lima last year. This unfriendly act did not represent the feeling of the country toward his person, but was organized by a few Communists and malcontents, the like of which can be found in any country in the world. Let me say here, although I'm sure the story was well covered by the local press, that Mr. NIXON reacted with the greatest dignity, patience, and courage, and that the Peruvian press, united for once, was loud in his praise, and its condemnation of such rowdyism.

Peru looks toward America as her friend and coworker. During Dr. Prado's first administration the United States was drawn into the Second World War. I believe Peru was the first South American country to declare herself on the side of the United States. I wasn't there at the time, and so I am not absolutely sure. But if it weren't the first, it was one of the first. I was there, however, when President Roosevelt died, and our cook, an uninstructed girl from the Andes who had come down to the capital to seek her fortune, but was hardly an expert on international relations, brought in the morning paper one day with the observation, "Senorita, ha muerto el Buen Vecino."

Moreover, American companies are in the vanguard of those with advanced social program, building their employees houses, schools, and churches. Interestingly enough for us here, let me point out that the Marcona mining company is a shining example of this enlightened policy. Among its top executives are fellow Stanford graduates Henry Mudd, Allan Christenson, and Ed Littlefield.

There are times, of course, when the Peruvian press justifiably criticizes the United States. Peru has been hard hit economically in recent years by the drop in the world price of many of its chief export commodities. There was some feeling against U.S. policies in 1958. Let me quote what Mr. Marvin Alisky, also a member of this panel, had to say at the time: "On September 22, 1958, President Eisenhower acted under a section of the Reciprocal Trade Act escape clause never before used. Thus, from October 1, only 80 percent of the 1953–57 Peruvian exports of lead and zinc were permitted to enter the United States. The press of Peru reacted, understandably, against this change in U.S. policy."

It seems to be the vogue now to criticize U.S. Ambassadors all over the world. I can only speak with knowledge of those I have known in Peru. In the last decade, this country has been represented by first-class career men, Harold Tittmah, Elliot O. Briggs, and now Theodore C. Achilles. You will be happy to learn if you don't already know it, that the latter is also a Stanford graduate. A man of high ideals who speaks the language fluently, he tackles Peru's problems with its relation to the United States, not in a routine, halfhearted manner, but rather devotes himself with all his intelligence and energy to improving Peruvian-American friendship.

Another popular misconception in this part of the world, is that which concerns the intentions of the armed forces in Latin American countries. Because of the existence of dictatorships in some countries, and the publicity given the overthrow of the military governments of Perón in Argentina, Rojas Pinilla in Colombia, Pérez Jiménez in Venezuela, and Batista in Cuba, many Americans have the mistaken idea that the armed forces of Latin countries are waiting anxiously for the day to take over the government. Not at all. There are times when the only way to throw off the yoke of a dictator, or a government which is going against the best interests of its people, is by an uprising of the military against that government. Let me make it clear that the military does not rise against the people of its country. Perhaps the case best known is that of Gen. Pedro Aramburu, now on a visit to the United States, where he courageously rose against Perón in Argentina. But he stepped down from power as soon as the country was settled, and made way for free election.

The military man realizes that in these days the main problem facing a government is an economic one, and that by reason of his training and experience he is rarely an expert in economic matters. In Peru, the army contributes to the progress of the country by helping to build roads, and cooperates with the local authorities in remote posts with the campaign against illiteracy. You are familiar with the CARE packages, sent free from the United States to foreign countries in need of such assistance. But once these packages arrive at the country of destination, the government—always hard pressed for funds—must take care of their transportation and distribution, at times a very expensive operation, especially so in a country such as Peru, which is not crisscrossed by highways and railroads. The Peruvian Army has volunteered to use its trucks and personnel to do this job. Also allow me to say that many military men are the first to condemn the ridiculous armament race which afflicts so many countries south of the border and north of it, too.

I am very sorry that, representing my husband here, I do not have time to tell you of the project closest to his heart: the introduction of an overall housing program, and the initiation of an intelligent agricultural reform. Over 3 years ago, he was appointed by President Prado to head a committee of public-spirited men of divergent political creeds. This group has worked hard and long, with no remuneration whatever except the satisfaction of tackling a tough problem and the determination to find its solution. One of the gratifying results of its efforts has been the establishment of a serious and well-organized savings and loan company for the first time, to aid people in the achievement of every man's desire, no matter in what country he lives—a home of his own. Just before I left Peru, my husband not as Prime Minister, but as prime mover of this idea, called together a group of men economically powerful in the community to seek their financial as well as their moral support of a newly established savings and loan association. The first million soles given was donated by W. R. Grace & Co., and many others, foreign as well as local, followed suit. By happy coincidence, a vice president of Grace's, Mr. John D. J. Moore, will address today's luncheon meeting.

I must close now, although I could go on discussing Peru indefinitely, believe me. But I do want to say, that like the United States, Peru is a country founded upon and guided by Christian principles. The great majority of its people are Catholic, and they excuse much, but never a denial of faith. With the grace of God, both of my countries, side by side, will emerge in either a cold or a hot war gloriously victorious. I am sure all of you will join me when I say a fervent "Viva el Peru."

ANTI-JEWISH DEMONSTRATIONS

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I know that so very early in the session we do not generally deal with matters of moment. However, I believe my colleagues will indulge me for calling attention to one situation—namely, the most regrettable and deeply tragic outbreak of anti-Semitic and pro-Nazi manifestations in West Germany on Christmas Eve, and the rash of similar demonstrations and anti-Catholic incidents which have spread to more than a dozen Western countries in the succeeding weeks. Certainly they warrant our grave concern.

They warrant our severest condemnation, and that of civilized men and women everywhere. The significance of the paint smears and scurrility that have marred the walls of synagogues and churches can be minimized only at our peril. They mean that enclaves of totalitarian danger of the extremist right continue to persist here in the free world, waiting to take advantage of any complacency. News reports indicate that ultra-right-wing elements are responsible for these outbreaks, and that their acts represent a kind of probing operation to test the world's reaction. A genuine, widespread expression of public indignation would make clear that we in this day and age will not tolerate the malignant evil of bigotry and prejudice. At the same time, we should extend every support to the German Federal Republic, under Chancellor Adenauer, in its efforts to uproot anti-Semitism and punish the hoodlums responsible for defacing the Bonn government's name. Especially Western Europe can show now support for and confidence in Chancellor Adenauer's determination to establish a new road of interfaith understanding for the German people and of free institutions which cannot tolerate neo-nazism.

In this connection, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD editorials from the New York Times, the New York Herald Tribune, the New York Post, the Washington Post, and the Long Island Daily Press, commenting on this problem. I hope that the example set by these splendid editorials will be emulated by public officials, radio and TV commentators, news analysts, and others, and that all of us will express with the utmost vigor our condemnation of these vicious anti-Semitic and anti-Catholic excesses.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEO-NAZI OUTRAGES

As the West prepares to meet Premier Khrushchev at the summit to debate the fate of Germany, that country is suddenly being subjected to what begins to look like a concerted series of neo-Nazi outrages with anti-Semitic and anti-Catholic implications and Communist cross-connections.

Following only scattered incidents after the war, the new outrages began on Christmas Eve with the desecration with swastika crosses and anti-Semitic invectives of a new synagogue and an anti-Nazi memorial in Cologne. They have since spread to at least five other towns and include the similar desecration of Catholic churches, the smearing of swastikas on stores, walls, park benches and war memorials.

These outrages, which revive memories of the Nazi terror, have rightly caused revulsion throughout the civilized world, including West Germany. The German Government, which has outlawed nazism, anti-Semitism and communism, and taken steps to atone for Nazi crimes, joins an aroused public opinion in denouncing the new offenses. The perpetrators of the Cologne outrage have been arrested and the Rightist splinter party which spawned them now faces suppression by the government.

The West Germans have special reasons to take a strong stand in this matter. Regarded by themselves, these incidents may not be very different from similar incidents in other countries, but the West Germans cannot afford to forget that anti-Semitism and anti-Catholicism were among the rungs in the ladder on which the Nazis climbed to power and that any new manifestation of their maniacal ideology must compromise both Germany's moral rehabilitation and political future.

There are some indications, including frequent visits of the Cologne offenders to Communist East Germany, that Communists are behind some of these incidents. This would be in line with present Soviet tactics. The Soviets smile on most Western leaders but attack West Germany and especially Chancellor Adenauer as "revanchist," "militaristic" and in effect Nazi-ruled, and neo-Nazi and anti-Semitic outrages could well serve their purpose of discrediting West Germany at this time.

For this reason the West must remain on guard not only against any Nazi revival but against any Soviet scheme to frighten it into ostracizing Germany.

SYNAGOGUES AND SWASTIKAS

The outbreak of anti-Semitic demonstrations in Germany, which began with the Christmas Eve desecration of the newly rebuilt Cologne synagogue and has spread to other cities, brings a disheartening echo of a past which that nation is trying to bury. But the reaction to it has also brought evidence of the deep determination that it shall be buried.

There is talk of outlawing the neo-Nazi Party which is suspected of responsibility. Chancellor Adenauer, who had himself delivered an address from the pulpit of the Cologne synagogue when it formally reopened 3 months ago, sent a message to its rabbi declaring that all decent Germans shared his revulsion at the sacrilege. President Luebke, in a New Year's Eve address, declared that "one is deeply alarmed at such brutalization," and called for vigilance "in preventing abhorrent occurrences which injure the defenseless and besmirch the name of Germany." Responsible citizens on all levels have reacted with anger and disgust.

Germany has reason to be especially sensitive about anti-Semitism; its outbreak there touches bitter memories shared by millions, and recalls all too vividly one of the most brutal chapters in the long history of man's inhumanity to man. It stings the conscience of a nation where thousands have made pilgrimages to the mass grave in which Anne Frank lies buried and in which, in city after city, when the play based on her diary swept Germany, capacity audiences sat after the final curtain, sometimes for a full 5 minutes, in silent and remorseful tribute.

But bigots and hate merchants are not the plague of any one nation alone. The outrages in Germany have been copied in other nations (including our own); the United States has had its synagogue bombings and still has its Ku Klux Klan. Such persons, however, speak only for themselves, not for a nation; and it is themselves, not their target of the moment, whom they mark for the scorn of humanity.

SWASTIKAS IN THE NEW GERMANY

Chancellor Adenauer and other German spokesmen have risen in prompt succession to denounce the anti-Semitic and anti-Catholic episodes which have marred the German landscape in recent days, evoking dark remembrance of things not long past. Their statements have been blunt and forthright; yet they do not offer total reassurance to a world still haunted by memory of the Hitler nightmare.

For one thing, the shock and surprise exhibited by the German leaders has a disturbing quality. Time and again they had proclaimed that Germany had successfully emerged from the sickness of Nazism; presumably they were convinced the recovery was complete. Now they seem baffled and inept as they seek to cope with the symptoms of recurrence.

It would be both unwise and unfair to exaggerate what has occurred so far. The incidents are still scattered, the perpetrators relatively few, and evidence as to how the new spasm of hatred has been incited remains unclear. But it would be equal folly to dismiss these wretched events as inconsequential. The world has made that mistake before.

Indeed, exactly such evasion may be responsible in large measure for the present condition. As a Bonn dispatch to the Times noted yesterday:

"Repeated incidents have shown that most German schoolchildren know little or nothing of what Hitler and the Nazis did, except perhaps that Hitler built the autobahns and wiped out unemployment. This silence in the schools has been compounded by even tighter silence in the homes."

There have been momentary exhibits of German recollection and remorse, such as the anguished response of German audiences to the showing of "The Diary of Anne Frank." Too many older Germans, however, have seemed to prefer to drop the whole subject, as if they could not bear to discuss their own guilt with their children. The policy of evasion has made it easier for neo-Nazis to return to positions of eminence, both in the schools and other key areas.

We do not question the earnestness of most of the German leaders who have condemned and repudiated these new manifestations of an uncured ailment. Nor do we suggest there are simple remedies. We say only that the warning is clear and that words must be accompanied by deeds—beginning in the schoolroom and extending to many other phases of German life.

Perhaps the most ominous aspect of the current outbreaks is that they occur in a time of rising German prosperity, and seem to reflect an element of contagion. The time for drastic countermeasures is now.

[From the Washington Post, Jan. 5, 1960]

VIRUS AND EPIDEMIC

The New Year has begun most disconcertingly with a series of anti-Jewish demonstrations, many of them in places where this form of social virulence has never been a serious factor. On the same day incidents have been reported from Melbourne, Milan, Parma, Stockholm, Oslo, Copenhagen, London, Leeds, Manchester, Dartford, Glasgow, Dublin, Antwerp, Amsterdam, Athens, New York, and Los Angeles as well as from Berlin, Frankfurt, Hamburg, and Vienna. All in all about 50 such demonstrations have been reported on three continents.

As to precisely what it all signifies, there seem to be two theories. One of them, apparently shared by many American Jews, is that the more recent incidents are sporadic and spontaneous, the work of individual cranks and fanatics or of sensation-seeking adolescents inspired by the publicity given to the cycle of outrages in West Germany, which began with the desecration of a new synagogue at Cologne on Christmas Eve. The other view, shared by some Jews abroad and by supporters of the Bonn government, is that the demonstrations have been organized for carefully calculated political purposes.

To accept the latter view is of course to raise the question who has organized the demonstrations and why. Some believe them to be the result of an arrangement among the various groups of neo-Fascist extremists which exist under different names in various countries. German sources say, however, that the neo-Fascists, however fanatical, simply do not possess an organization capable of demonstrations on such a scale but that the Communists do; and that the plain purpose is to weaken the support of the Bonn government among its Western allies by reviving memories of the horrors perpetrated under the Third Reich. This view is given a good deal of plausibility by the editorial reaction of the Communist press, which has already begun to denounce the Bonn government for its "indulgence" toward "militarist and Fascist provocateurs."

Up to now the Bonn government has made no direct accusation of Communist collusion with the neo-Nazi demonstrators, and tangible proof of it appears to be still lacking. But "indulgent" is certainly a strange word to describe its attitude of indignation and alarm.

THE GERMS OF HATE ARE THE WORST

The swastikas painted on two synagogues over the weekend smear the entire Long Island community.

The rock that crashes through the window of a church of any faith injures all decent people—of all races, creeds, and colors.

So do other acts and forms of bigotry.

It is too easy to shrug off such incidents as the work of crackpots or irresponsible young people. Anyone, young or old, who will paint hate symbols on buildings or light fiery crosses certainly is warped in his attitude toward his fellowman, his country and his God, if he has one.

The germs of hate are the worst of all. They must be conquered. This calls for the sternest attention by our police and other officials.

Mayor Wagner summed up public opinion when he said: "The desecration of a religious institution is a shameful and cowardly act. New York has no room—and never will have room—for such Nazi-like tactics. We cannot and will not permit a renaissance of Hitlerism here or anywhere else in the world. We paid too high a price to crush it once before."

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield, if I may.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, decent people in every clime are shocked and dismayed and entertain the deepest indignation at the ugly efforts directed by bigots against peoples, because of their religion or because of their race or because of their color, whether undertaken in free America or in any other country of the globe. Surely to the extent that we, who represent free peoples, can indicate our own grave concern, we shall have helped contribute our mite to the elimination in the future of the kind of supremely ugly work to which my friend, the Senator from New York, has just alluded.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank my colleague.

Mr. MORSE subsequently said: Mr. President, I wish to associate myself with the remarks of the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] and of the Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL] in regard to what appears to be a rising tide of anti-Semitism in various parts of the world.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that these brief remarks be printed in the RECORD immediately following the remarks of the Senator from New York and of the Senator from California.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, history has a habit of repeating itself. I would point out to the Government and to the people of West Germany and to the governments and to the peoples of other countries where there has been evidence in recent days of a growing anti-Semitic feeling that free men and women everywhere are watching them. For a long time, Mr. President, the free nations of the world were rather reticent in protesting against similar beginnings of anti-Semitism in Hitler Germany. I hope such reticence will not prevail at this time. I hope the free nations of the world will make very clear to those countries in which this anti-Jewish bigotry is rearing its ugly head again that freedom cannot be reconciled with such intolerance.

One of the reasons why I opposed the Eisenhower doctrine in the Middle East was that I could not get the Senate to adopt an amendment which would have required some commitments before the fact on the part of the heads of some governments, which were to be aided under that doctrine, that they would desist from their threats that they would wipe the State of Israel off the face of the map at the first opportunity. Mr. President, there has been no change in that anti-Semitic attitude on the part of those governments.

We have now pending a proposal for a loan to Nasser of Egypt for improvements of the Suez Canal. Mr. President, I am one Senator who protests the investment of a single American dollar in any improvements in the Suez Canal until Nasser reverses himself and changes his attitude with regard to his discriminations against the State of Israel. His insistence on continuing a policy that ships destined for Israel shall not go through the Suez Canal and the free nation of Israel shall not have any privileges to use that waterway disqualifies his canal project for an American loan.

Mr. President, it is well to talk about supporting freedom, but the test is whether we will act in protecting freedom. The request by Nasser for a Suez Canal loan is another opportunity, in my opinion, for us to demonstrate to the world that freedom is not a cliche with us, but is a way of life. We can demonstrate, with regard to the Suez Canal, that we do not intend to support with American dollars a nation which insists upon following an anti-Semitic course of action.

OPPOSITION OF UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN TO LOYALTY OATH REQUIREMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENSE EDUCATION ACT

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I am very proud to inform the Senate that the University of Wisconsin has become the first land-grant institution in America to go publicly and officially on record against the loyalty oath requirement of the National Defense Education Act.

The University of Wisconsin has a long and noble history of dedication to the search for truth and its constant companion the freedom to speak or not to speak, untrammeled by any dictation or domination, even in the name of patriotism.

This action by the faculty of the University of Wisconsin makes this U.S. Senator deeply proud of the State he in part represents and the great State university that continues to serve as such an inspiring moral and intellectual leader for our State.

I ask unanimous consent that a newspaper article reporting the action by the University of Wisconsin on the student loyalty oath be printed at this point in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WISCONSIN UNIVERSITY PROTESTS U.S. LOYALTY OATH

MADISON, WIS., January 5.—The University of Wisconsin today was the first land-grant institution to take a stand against the loyalty oath requirement of the National Defense Education Act.

Faculty members voted to ask the next session of Congress to eliminate the loyalty oath provision as a condition of eligibility for students who wish to borrow money to continue their educations.

The act asks students borrowing money to sign an affidavit saying they are not members of organizations listed as subversive by the U.S. Attorney General's office.

The university so far has received $127,794 under the program.

A land-grant institution is a State university, agricultural or industrial college in the United States receiving Government lands or funds under the Federal Land-Grant Acts of 1862 and 1890.

INTEREST RATE LABELING

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I happily call to the attention of my colleagues an enthusiastic, if slightly bemused, endorsement of the proposal of the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], which I cosponsor, to require interest rate labeling. This endorsement comes from the Nation's leading financial daily newspaper, and argues eloquently for the solid moral value in the Douglas proposal.

I ask unanimous consent that the editorial from today's Wall Street Journal be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPOTLIGHT ON DEBT

The Democrats, our Mr. Novak reports from Washington, want to put a legislative spotlight on how the high cost of debt adds to the total cost of things people buy.

The plan, sponsored by Senator DOUGLAS, is to pass a law to require interest rate labeling on consumer installment purchases, mortgages, and the like. Thus, a customer buying a TV set on installments would be told not only the list price and the rate of interest on the balance but also the total cost, including all the interest, over the entire period of the payments.

Well, we don't know that a law will necessarily help matters. But it would certainly be a good thing if more people realized how much it adds to the total cost of anything when the payment is deferred to the future.

Most people would be surprised, we think, to learn how much interest costs add to the total cost of things. When a man takes out a $10,000 mortgage for 20 years, he is usually aware in a general way that he is paying extra each month for the privilege of postponing payment. But how many, we wonder, realize that on a 4-percent mortgage this adds about $4,500 to the nominal price he thinks he's paying for the house? Or that at 6 percent this added cost is nearer $7,000—much more than half again the apparent size of the mortgage?

A good many more people would be surprised, we think, to learn how much of their tax bill—which they may think goes to such worthy enterprises as national defense—is likewise paid in interest on the huge debt which their Government, with the help of these self-same Democratic politicians, has piled up over the years.

Every time our Government decides to do something for us now—build a road, let us say, or a dam—and pay for it later the real cost is a lot bigger than the nominal cost. Because of this cumulative debt from the past, often so casually assumed, the Government this year had to budget more than $8 billion just to pay interest on its debt.

Properly spotlighted, this could prove quite illuminating to the taxpayers. It means that $1 of every $10 the tax collector extracts from him is a present penalty for past indulgence. Or put another way, it means that in a decade the taxpayers must shell out for past debts alone the equivalent of a whole year's $80 billion budget.

It would help, too, if the spotlight was aimed a little bit into the future. Budget Director Stans, for example, has estimated that right now the Government of the United States has piled up future obligations, representing a mortgage against all taxpayers tomorrow, of $750 billion. This is more than twice what the public label shows as the nominal national debt.

We just wish Senator DOUGLAS and the other liberal Democrats, in their zeal for illuminated labels, would start a campaign to spread some light in this direction also.

ELIMINATION OF SPECIAL TAX DEDUCTION FOR DIVIDEND RECIPIENTS

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, last session the distinguished junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCCARTHY], introduced a bill—which passed this body, but died in the House—designed to end the present provision in the tax laws which provides a special tax deduction for dividend recipients. That McCarthy proposal was attacked on the grounds that dividends deserve special consideration for one particular reason. Opponents of the McCarthy bill argued that dividends are already taxed indirectly through the corporation income tax. They argue that the special tax deduction therefore constitutes a partial compensation for the corporation income tax which dividends already bear.

Those of us who supported the McCarthy bill disputed this contention. We pointed out that corporation customers bear at least part of the incidence of the corporation income tax in higher prices for the goods the corporation sells; and that therefore the consumer is as much entitled to a special tax deduction as is the stockholder.

In general, the financial community and its spokesmen took the stockholder side, and argued that the stockholder bore the full incidence of the corporation income tax. Letters from President Funston, of the New York Stock Exchange, for instance, addressed to me and other Senators, did this.

On November 16, the main premise of those of us who supported the McCarthy amendment was supported by a remarkably telling authority under the circumstances. On the front page of the Wall Street Journal, George Shea, the wise and responsible commentator for this great financial newspaper, wrote:

> When there is talk of reducing the corporate tax the alternative frequently suggested is a manufacturers' sales tax. The difficulty is that many people, including this writer, don't see too much difference in the net effect of the two. Corporations must collect the income tax they pay from their customers through the prices they charge them, just as they would have to do with a tax on the goods they sell.

Let me repeat that last sentence from the front page of last November's Wall Street Journal, and let us think of it in terms of who really bears the burden of the corporation income tax:

> Corporations must collect the income tax they pay from their customers through the prices they charge them, just as they would have to do with a tax on the goods they sell.

So says the Wall Street Journal. I say the Journal is right; and if it is, the whole case against the McCarthy bill goes up in smoke. It becomes obvious that if we agree with the Wall Street Journal, then it follows that the special tax deduction permitted dividends is an unwarranted, unjustified, special privilege which results in a lower tax rate for dividend income than for wage income and other income—a special privilege that cannot be justified.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article from the Wall Street Journal be printed at this point in the body of the Record.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, Nov. 16, 1959]

THE OUTLOOK: APPRAISAL OF CURRENT TRENDS IN BUSINESS AND FINANCE

Today hearings will start before the House Ways and Means Committee on possible ways of revising the income tax law, with the laudable purpose of obtaining more revenue through lower tax rates. The idea is to close "loopholes" whereby some groups escape their full tax, which would bring in enough added revenue to lower the rates for those who do pay fully.

Unfortunately, not too much reliance should be placed on the hopes for more revenue through the closing of loopholes. The word loopholes is widely used to mean three different kinds of tax avoidance or evasion, whereas it should properly be applied to only one.

A true loophole is a provision which permits legal avoidance of tax by recipients of income which Congress intended to tax. For instance, years ago it used to be possible for a man with a loss on a stock he wanted to keep, to sell it and buy it back the same day and reduce the amount of his taxable income by the loss on the sale. But Congress stopped that, and over the years has closed many other true loopholes. The few left probably don't account for very much lost revenue.

People who claim there are still big loopholes left usually have in mind two other kinds of income. One is income that illegally escapes tax, such as unreported dividends or unreported savings-bank interest. That's not a loophole, but an administrative problem. Estimates of how much revenue is thus lost run as high as a billion or two, but that is mostly guesswork. In the first place, the larger a taxpayer's income, the less likely he is as a general rule to dare to cheat by failing to report income. In the second place, some so-called unreported income accrues to people with incomes so small they shouldn't pay tax anyhow—such as youngsters who've been given a savings account.

Another kind of tax-free income, or income taxed at reduced rates, which is often falsely called a beneficiary of loopholes in the law, is income that Congress fully intended to treat favorably. One example is the income from producing oil wells to the extent it is untaxed because of the depletion deduction specifically permitted in the law. Another is the joint income of married couples, for whom the law provides a special table of reduced tax rates.

If anyone thinks such income should no longer get favored treatment he is entitled to his opinion. But to call provisions of this sort loopholes is in effect to say Congress didn't know what it was doing when it decided on the provisions after thorough debate.

Furthermore, Congress is hardly likely to be persuaded it made mistakes in these just because someone tries to rename the provisions loopholes. The same thing is true of the tax exemption of interest on State and municipal bonds and other tax freedoms such as those of cooperatives. Maybe some of these will be changed to some extent, but in large part the same political and logical factors which put them in the law will keep them there.

However, none of the foregoing constitutes a reason for abandoning the search for reductions in tax rates. The most popular target for such cuts, among the statements made to the House committee in advance of its hearings, is the schedule of individual income tax rates, which rises to 91 percent and starts at the very high minimum of 20 percent. As mentioned by Roswell Magill, president of the nonprofit tax foundation, this range of rates, as well as the present exemption of $1,200 for a married couple, is almost exactly the same as during World War II, when income tax rates were levied not only to boost Federal revenue but also for the purpose of limiting incomes. This was a valid purpose during wartime shortages, but is the opposite of a proper peacetime policy, when growth is the goal.

As for the chances for any such reductions, they are lessened by the prospect for a Federal budget deficit in the fiscal year 1959–60 because of the steel strike. But there are some favorable factors. The strongest is that everyone wants income tax cuts for individuals, even though opinions differ on whether the low-bracket or the high-bracket rates, or both, should be cut.

Another favorable factor is that the pall on incentives of any income tax rate much above 50 percent is so obvious. Not a few of us personally know individuals of inherently energetic and productive disposition who quit working because the return after taxes has ceased to be worth the effort.

Such men often sell the small businesses they have built up to large corporations. And this very fact emphasizes how much less pressure there is for corporation tax cuts than there is for lower individual tax rates. If a corporation did not find such businesses worth buying in spite of the corporate tax that applies to them once they are bought, it wouldn't buy them.

When there is talk of reducing the corporate tax the alternative most frequently suggested is a manufacturers' sales tax. The difficulty is that many people, including this writer, don't see too much difference in the net effect of the two. Corporations must collect the income tax they pay from their customers through the prices they charge them, just as they would have to do with a tax on the goods they sell. The main difference is that the manufacturers' sales tax would apply only to manufacturers and not directly to other corporations.

The policy advantage (if it may be so called) of the corporate income tax is that it is now so high, at a rate above 50 percent, that almost no one in his right mind would dare suggest it be increased. Thus it, together with the excessively high individual income tax, acts as some sort of ceiling on what the Federal Government can hope to collect with the present forms of tax. And because budget deficits are unpopular, the present system constitutes something of a bar to new spending.

But if the easily hidden manufacturers' sales tax were adopted, it would tend to dissolve this safety factor. A new and rich field of revenue for the spenders to cultivate would be opened up. We might end up with both the corporate income tax and the manufacturers' sales tax.

GEORGE SHEA.

MISMANAGEMENT OF ACREAGE RESERVE AND CONSERVATION RESERVE PROGRAMS—REPORT OF COMPTROLLER GENERAL

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, today I wish to discuss a recent Comptroller General's report in which our attention was called to the manner in which millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money is being wasted through the mismanagement of the acreage reserve and conservation reserve programs.

Based upon this report, 23 million acres have been contracted for under the conservation reserve program. Of this amount, 5,400,000 acres, or 23 percent of the estimated total, either had been devoted to hay and pasture, had been idle or summer fallowed, or had a history of continuous crop failure.

Payments on this land alone would amount to $54 million annually, or about $270 million over the average life of the contract.

These are payments being made to remove from agriculture production land which was never intended to be, and more than likely never would have been, in annual production, anyway.

To prevent abuses of the program, Congress had limited annual rental payments to 20 percent of the agricultural value of the land placed under 1959 contracts; but, according to the Comptroller General, even this liberal limitation has not been effectively adhered to.

In his report numerous instances are cited wherein the annual maximum payment limitation of $5,000 established by the conservation reserve program regulations had been exceeded.

As examples of this mismanagement, the following specific cases are cited:

In the States of New Mexico, Texas, and Colorado it was found that land was being leased at very low rental rates from the States and then being placed in the conservation reserve program at substantially higher rates.

NEW MEXICO

The Comptroller General's office reviewed the ASC records and the records of the New Mexico State Land Office to determine the extent of the conservation reserve participation of lands that had been leased from the State.

Based upon reports from the ASC county offices, about 27,000 acres of land leased from the State had been placed in the conservation reserve program. This land is part of 120 farm units located in 13 New Mexico counties.

It was estimated that the conservation reserve rental payments on this acreage would total about $212,000 a year, or an average of about $8 an acre. The records showed that lease-rental payments paid to the State on this same acreage would be about $6,500 a year, or an average of about $0.24 an acre.

Based on these estimates, the lessees would receive conservation reserve payments of $205,500 a year in excess of their lease-rental payments to the State land office.

COLORADO

A summary prepared by the ASC Colorado State office on April 1, 1959, presents data on the conservation reserve participation of State leased lands throughout Colorado.

This summary shows that about 50 farms in the State, containing about 36,800 acres of land, leased from the State at rates averaging $0.36 an acre for grazing land and $1.83 an acre for cropland, were participating in the conservation reserve in Colorado.

About 8,500 acres of land from these farms were placed in the conservation reserve at annual rental payments averaging over $7 an acre, or a total of about $62,000 a year.

TEXAS

In Texas, based on inquiries sent to the ASC county offices by the State committee, they found that there are 8 farms, containing an estimated 1,550 acres of land, which had been leased from the State or its agencies which had been placed in the conservation reserve program.

Under the conservation reserve program, the Federal Government was paying on this land annual rental payments averaging about $9 an acre; while based on information obtained from the Texas State agencies owning the land, it was being leased for about $0.80 per acre.

NORTH DAKOTA

In North Dakota in July 1956, one farmer purchased about 280 acres of land, including 139 acres of cropland, for $5,000. Substantially all the cropland acres were placed in the conservation reserve under a 5-year 1959 contract. Under this contract, this farmer will receive annual rental payments of $9.70 for each acre of cropland placed in the reserve, or a total of about $6,400 over the 5-year period of the contract. The whole farm cost him only $5,000 in 1956.

I now call attention to another type of abuse.

Section 485.164(b)(4) of the conservation reserve program regulations provides that two or more individuals operating as a group under an arrangement which, although lacking the legal elements of a partnership or corporation, is in the nature of a joint undertaking shall be considered as a producer and that members of the group shall not be considered as separate producers on the same farm. Section 485.164(b)(6) provides that individuals having a joint or common interest arising out of their interest in the ownership of the farm as joint tenants, tenants by the entirety, or tenants in common shall not be considered as separate producers on the same farm.

Notwithstanding this intended limitation, one particular family, composed of the father, grandfather, and minor son, age 14, and three other minor children between the ages of 10 and 12, divided the farm into different units and together entered into contracts under the conservation reserve program wherein they stand to collect a total of $165,000. This is broken down as follows:

Father	$50,000
Grandfather	50,000
Minor son (age 14)	15,000
3 other minor children (ages 10 to 12)	50,000
Total	165,000

This was accomplished through a series of transactions wherein the father sold to the grandfather an undivided one-half interest in a portion of the farm and then transferred other portions to the four minor children with the proviso that he would operate as their legal guardian.

Not only are these payments excessive, but here we have three children under the age of 12 being paid $50,000 not to farm.

The Comptroller General's complete report on this transaction I ask to have printed at the conclusion of my remarks as exhibit A.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit A.)

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I shall not detain the Senate with additional examples of these discrepancies. The cases cited are typical of the indefensible manner in which the taxpayers' money is being squandered under the loose management practices condoned by the officials administering this program.

It is apparent that in many areas the public officials administering this program operate on the basis, "Here is some easy money from the Government; come and get it."

These examples represent but a small portion of the millions of dollars that are being wasted under this program.

I strongly recommend that every Member of the Senate study carefully this report of the Comptroller General.

EXHIBIT A

PARTICIPATION OF ONE FAMILY IN TWO STATES

The following case was included in the additional 16 cases discussed with officials of the Soil Bank Division and on which information was given to that division so that administrative review of the propriety of the contract payments could be initiated. Although it is not typical, it is being reported in detail because of certain unusual aspects.

Members of one family participating in the conservation reserve program in two States will eventually receive about $165,000 in total rental payments. The members of the family involved are grandfather, father, minor son, and three other minor children. A summary of the payments to be received follows:

By father	$50,000
By grandfather	50,000
By minor son	15,000
By 3 other minor children	50,000
Total	165,000

In one State, 2,600 acres of a 3,600-acre farm owned by the father was divided into five parcels and sold in February 1957. The sales were contingent upon each purchaser's execution of a 10-year conservation reserve contract. The payment of consideration in each sale is required to be made by endorsing over to the seller annually the conservation reserve payment received by the buyer. About $210,000 is to be assigned by the purchasers over the 10-year terms of the contracts.

The provisions contained in the sales contracts making the sales contingent on conservation reserve participation are quoted in pertinent part below:

"All liability upon its contract is conditioned and contingent upon second parties executing a 10-year conservation agreement with the * * * county ASC, an agency of the Federal Government, under the terms of which, second parties shall receive annual payment of not less than $9 per acre for all cultivated land in consideration of their following the conservation practices set forth in said agreement.

"Upon the execution of such ASC contract, liability upon this agreement shall become fixed."

The father sold to the grandfather an undivided one-half interest in about 679 of the remaining 1,000 acres. The father informed us that he (or he and his wife) was the owner of record on this acreage subject to the contract for deed to the grandfather for a one-half interest. ASC county records show that this 1,000 acres was combined with 480 acres owned by the grandfather and 160 acres owned by another party. About 1,100 acres of this farm was placed in the conservation reserve in March 1957 under a 10-year contract and earns an annual payment of $10,000 a year. This annual payment is shared equally between the grandfather, as owner, and the father, as operator, so that each received the $5,000 maximum annual payment permitted under the conservation reserve program. None of the land belonging to the third party is under contract.

Although title to this land rests as set forth above, the ASC county records show that the grandfather is the owner of this farm unit and the father is the operator.

In a second State, the father had purchased two separate tracts of land. By quitclaim deed dated March 31, 1958, he acquired title to a 320-acre farm. By quitclaim deed of the same date, this farm was transferred to his minor son. The minor son placed 250 acres of this farm under a 1958 conservation reserve contract for an annual payment of $1,500 or a total of $15,000 over the 10-year period of the contract. Practice payments of $2,140 were paid to the minor son on this farm.

In a contract dated January 21, 1958, the father purchased an undivided one-half interest in about 13,000 acres of land in the second State from the grandfather. Prior to this date, the title had been held jointly by the father and the grandfather. By warranty deed dated March 25, 1958, the father transferred 920 acres of this land to his three minor children. The father signed a conservation reserve contract as "legal guardian" for the three minor children, placing 834 acres of this farm under a 1958 conservation reserve contract for an annual payment of $5,000 a year or $50,000 over the 10-year period of the contract. Practice payments of $7,290 were made on this farm.

In our audit we interviewed the father, the grandfather, and a sister of the father. In these interviews, we obtained the following information:

1. The minor son was 14 years of age when he acquired the farm from his father. The other three minor children were between 10 and 12 years of age when they acquired their farm from their father and when their father signed the contract as "legal guardian," placing the farm in the conservation reserve.

2. At the time the conservation reserve contracts were entered into for or by the children, the four children lived in the same household with their father.

3. Conservation reserve payments on the minor son's farm are made directly to the minor son. Conservation reserve payments on the other children's farm are received by the father as legal guardian of the three other children. The father does not maintain a separate accounting for the guardianship funds, but he informed us that he could account for these funds in a court action.

4. The legal guardianship over the three younger children has no legal status other than that derived from his being their father.

5. Separate income tax returns are filed by or for the four children.

6. The minor son had assisted his father in farming but had not operated a farm prior to acquisition of his farm.

This case was discussed with administrative officials of the ASC county and State offices in the second State. They informed us that they did not know that the father was participating in the conservation reserve outside the State, and they did not know the minor son was 14 years old at the time the conservation reserve contract was entered into. They had understood the son to have been 17 years old at the time. They informed us that, had they known the son was only 14 years of age, they would not have approved the contract.

Prior to making the first annual payment on the contract, county office officials questioned the father about the legal guardianship arrangement. He informed the officials that he wanted the proceeds of the contract set aside in a trust fund for the children's future education.

The State officials informed us that they understood, also, that the father's intentions under the legal guardianship arrangement were to establish a trust fund for the children's education with the conservation reserve payments from the farm. The State officials believed that a producer could not purchase land and put it in the soil bank in the name of his children. They further informed us that, had they known of the father's conservation reserve participation in the first State and the correct ages of the children, the State office would not have given its approval to the contracts on these two farms.

We believe that the conservation reserve participation of this family in the two States may constitute a scheme or device to exceed the $5,000 conservation reserve payment limitation.

The Soil Bank Division referred this case to the Office of the General Counsel of the Department on September 8, 1959. On October 22, 1959, the Acting Deputy General Counsel advised that, in the first State, the contract of the father and grandfather was prepared in accordance with the existing program regulations and does not in itself constitute a violation of the $5,000 payment limitation but that, in the second State, the father appears to be directly benefiting from the payments made with respect to the land transferred to his children and the circumstances suggest that the purpose of the transfers was to further the interests of the father and grandfather in preventing the application of the payment limitation to their landholdings. The opinion was expressed by the Acting Deputy General Counsel that, on the facts presented, notice of an indicated violation should be given to the family members involved.

In a letter dated December 14, 1959, from the Administrator, CSS, we were informed that, in the opinion of the Office of the General Counsel, there is every indication that the family violated the contract in the first State by their actions in the second State and that a determination of violation by the ASC State committee would result in the family's forfeiting all rights to compensation under the contracts in the two States during all the years in which the violation existed.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The Senator from Delaware has again displayed his customary ability to ferret out some facts which should be brought to the attention of the American people and the Congress. I shall read the report to which he has referred with great interest.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I thank the Senator from South Dakota.

JAMES V. ALLRED: A HELPING HAND FOR THE NEEDY; A FIST AGAINST UNJUST POWER

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, not often through the mists of Texas time has a man risen from the masses who at once had a heartfelt and soulful concern for life's "have-nots," and possessed with that concern the iron and fire to fight unjust economic and political power whenever he found it.

James V. Allred, onetime shoeshine boy, sailor, lawyer, attorney general of Texas, twice Governor of Texas, and a U.S. district judge, was such a man. He died at Laredo, Tex., at 4:50 p.m. on September 24, 1959, and millions of Texans are mourning his passing.

Nothing I could say here could begin adequately to eulogize this great Texan and great American who is justly mentioned in the same breath with Sam Houston and Jim Hogg. He had the most sincere concern for the rights and welfare of the individual of any man I have ever known. During his years as attorney general and in his administration as Governor, the depression years of 1935–39, all the people of Texas had fair, able and impartial representation.

It was my honor and privilege to serve nearly 4 years on Jimmy Allred's staff when he was attorney general.

He was sharp in his wit, gentle with his employees, tireless in his work, loving of mankind, and he believed in a God of mercy and justice and charity.

Jimmy Allred will be remembered in history as this generation's most humane governmental leader in Texas.

Damon Runyon, America's master of the short story, wrote a beautiful tale about Dr. Brackett, a kindly country doctor who spent all his time caring for the poor, and who, consequently, was himself short of funds. He had a little two-room office upstairs over a store, and it was marked at the ground floor door by a sign with an arrow which read, "Dr. Brackett, office upstairs."

The doctor treated the needy for years, and finally when he died, there was talk that someone ought to chip in and buy a monument to put over his grave. But if his patients had no money to pay him in life, they had even less to contribute to his memory. His resting place was unmarked for several days until one of his patients brought out the sign from his door which the townfolks agreed was the perfect headstone for him. It was the one with the arrow pointing heavenward that read: "Dr. Brackett, office upstairs."

Such a monument would be fitting for Governor Allred, too, for he was ever a man of deep Christian conviction and principle.

Texas has not seen his like in the past 60 years; Texas may not see his like in the next 60.

Mr. President, thousands of words have been written concerning the life of this great Texan. In an effort to help record his work, I ask unanimous consent to have the following articles printed in the body of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

FEDERAL JUDGE ALLRED DIES OF HEART ATTACK—STRICKEN IN COURT AT LAREDO

James V. Allred, 60, Federal district judge and former Governor of Texas, died of a heart attack in a Laredo hospital at 4:50 p.m. yesterday.

His physican, Dr. John T. Lowry, said Allred had complained Wednesday of severe chest pains and an electrocardiogram was made. But the judge returned to the bench yesterday morning to preside at the September term of court for the southern district of Texas.

At 11:30 a.m. he interrupted court to say he was a "little under the weather" and called a recess until 2:30 p.m. Lowry was called to Allred's hotel room at 2 p.m. and advised the judge to enter a hospital immediately.

He arrived at the hospital at about 4:15 p.m. and died there about 35 minutes later. Mrs. Allred was with him when he died.

SURVIVORS

His immediate family includes his wife and three sons, Capt. James Allred, Jr., 29, an Air Force pilot; David Allred, 25, a member of the Washington staff of U.S. Senator RALPH YARBOROUGH; and Sam Houston Allred, 22, a student at Southern Methodist University, in Dallas; and a granddaughter.

Funeral services will be at the First Christian Church tomorrow afternoon. Burial will be at Riverside Cemetery, Wichita Falls at a time to be announced. Cage-Mills Funeral Home in Corpus Christi is in charge of local arrangements.

From his headquarters in Corpus Christi, Allred had presided for the past 10 years over Federal court sessions in Victoria, Laredo, Brownsville and here, occasionally sitting in at Houston. Mrs. Allred, the former Miss Betsy Joe Miller of Wichita Falls, who married him June 20, 1927, usually accompanied him on his trips.

Except in emergencies, they returned to their home, 412 Del Mar Boulevard, each weekend. The judge taught a Sunday school class of married couples at the First Christian Church and Mrs. Allred taught a class of Latin American youngsters.

HIS AMBITIONS

Asked once what his ambition was for Corpus Christi and south Texas, Allred answered: "Better understanding and cooperation between the races."

Allred had a reputation as a stern judge, but his sternness often imperfectly concealed compassion. He had known what it was like to be hungry in his youth and never forgot it. In almost every criminal case which came before him he was willing to give a first offender a second chance.

In one case he reprimanded an Internal Revenue Service agent for threatening and intimidating two local taxpayers with revocation of probation if they did not pay delinquent income taxes.

THEFT CASE

In another case he dismissed a charge of interstate transportation of a stolen automobile against a defendant who had been held in jail for more than a month in another State while awaiting trial. Allred ruled that the defendant had been denied a prompt and speedy trial guaranteed him under the Constitution.

After he had given one defendant another chance, he received this letter: "Your true understanding of my situation 2½ years ago straightened out my life. You are a kind and generous man."

Allred was born March 29, 1899, in Bowie, one of six sons and three daughters born to Renne and Mary Allred. His father was a rural mail carrier and a wagonyard operator. He graduated from Bowie High School in 1917, selling newspapers and shining shoes to help support his family. Instead of accepting scholarships offered him by Texas A. & M. and several other schools (he had played tackle on the Bowie High School football team) he decided to attend Rice Institute in Houston.

"It was my first time away from home," Allred said in an interview earlier this year, recalling his youth. "I worked at a service station out on Preston and rode the trolley from school to work and back, an hour each way. I stayed 2 months, got overworked and homesick, and quit."

PEANUT BROKER

He worked for a time with a peanut broker in Fort Worth and then joined the U.S. Immigration Service in El Paso, leaving June 14, 1918, to enlist in the Navy as an apprentice seaman. He received his discharge in 1919. He returned to Wichita Falls, where his family had moved. He worked there at a law office as a stenographer for 2 months before he could save enough money to buy a suit of clothes, wearing his Navy uniform in the interim.

As a boy of 15, Allred had become fascinated by the drama of a courtroom trial and determined to become a prosecuting attorney. In 1920 he enrolled at Cumberland University in Lebanon, Tenn., earned his law degree in a year, and returned to Texas to take the bar examination.

"On July 13, 1921, I received a wire telling me I had passed," Allred once said. "I felt like I could have jumped a five-wire fence."

EARLY APPOINTMENT

Gov. Pat M. Neff appointed Allred as district attorney for Wichita, Archer, and Young Counties on December 21, 1923. He was elected to a full term in 1924. In 1926 he ran for attorney general, losing in the runoff by only 4,046 votes. He returned to the private practice of law, but returned in 1930 to run for attorney general and win.

He ran for Governor in 1934, defeating Tom Hunter in the runoff by more than 40,000 votes to become the 13th Governor of Texas and youngest Governor in the Nation at the age of 35. He was reelected to a second term in 1936 and served out his term before accepting a nomination as a Federal district judge.

President Franklin D. Roosevelt stepped to the rear platform of a special train at Wichita Falls in 1938 to announce Allred's appointment as a Federal judge.

The Allred family moved to Houston, where Allred took the oath of a Federal judge on March 4, 1939. But in 1942 he resigned to enter the special election to name a successor to Senator Morris Shepperd, who died in office. He was beaten by W. Lee O'Daniel by 18,000 votes.

STILL ACTIVE

O'Daniel blocked Allred's appointment as a judge to the Fifth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, but Allred continued actively in politics and campaigned vigorously for Senator LYNDON B. JOHNSON in 1948. He was reappointed Federal judge of the southern district of Texas by President Harry S. Truman, moved to Corpus Christi and took his place on the bench October 29, 1949.

Commenting on his political philosophy Allred said, "I thought I was a moderate, but these history books have made me a liberal. But that's all right."

Looking back over his two terms as Governor, Allred said:

"One of the things I am proudest of is the interstate oil compact, which saved the oil industry from Federal control. The conservatives won't admit it, but I and Ernest Thompson, backed by half a dozen independents, were responsible for getting the oil compact adopted."

NATIONAL HONOR

Allred was selected the most outstanding young man in America in 1935 by the National Junior Chamber of Commerce. He was a 32d degree Mason, Shriner, Elk, Knight of Pythias and a member of the Odd Fellows.

In Stephenville, Governor Daniel had this comment upon hearing of the death of Allred:

"Judge Allred's death is a great loss to the State he loved. He will long be remembered for his years of devoted public service as attorney general, Governor, and Federal judge.

"Mrs. Daniel and I join his host of friends in extending heartfelt sympathy to Mrs. Allred and the other members of the family."

FUNERAL SET FOR ALLRED

LAREDO.—James V. Allred, Federal district judge and former Governor and attorney general of Texas, died of a heart attack Thursday shortly after being admitted to Mercy Hospital. He was 60.

Allred, who was presiding at the September term here of the U.S. District Court for south Texas, complained of severe chest pains Wednesday and was treated at his hotel by a physician.

He returned to the bench Thursday, but at 11:30 a.m. interrupted a trial at which he was presiding, announced he was "a little under the weather," and adjourned court until 2:30 p.m.

He went to his hotel. Later in the afternoon his court clerk, A. J. Alemia of Edinburg, drove him to the hospital. He died of a coronary occlusion at 4:50 p.m., 35 minutes after being admitted.

Mrs. Allred, who accompanied her husband on his circuits of the large south Texas district, was at the hospital when he died.

Funeral services will be held Saturday afternoon at the First Christian Church, Corpus Christi. Burial will be at Riverside Cemetery, Wichita Falls, at a time to be announced.

In addition to his wife, Allred is survived by three sons, Captain James Allred, 29, an Air Force pilot; David, 25, a member of the Washington staff of U.S. Senator RALPH YARBOROUGH and Sam Houston, 22, a student at Southern Methodist University, Dallas; and a granddaughter.

Other survivors include a sister, Mrs. Jeff Christian, Fort Worth; and three brothers, O. H. Allred, regional director of the Securities and Exchange Commission, Fort Worth; Ben Allred of Dallas; Renne Allred of Bowie, and Raymond Allred of Odessa.

Governor Price Daniel called Allred's death "A great loss to the State he loved. He will long be remembered for his years of devoted public service as attorney general, Governor, and Federal judge."

YARBOROUGH called Allred "The most eloquent champion of the people of Texas of our generation" and added "We friends who served him will miss him greatly."

Allred was born March 29, 1899, in Bowie, Tex., the son of a pioneer family. His great-grandfather came to Texas from Tennessee. His father and mother, Mr. and Mrs. Renne Allred, once lived in a dugout in Childress County, where they took up a land claim. Drought drove them to Grayson County and later to Bowie, where his father was a rural mail carrier and operated a wagon yard.

Young Allred was christened James Burr V Allred for three uncles. Although the "V" stood for no name, Allred was known as "Vee" in his youth.

After graduating from Bowie High School he enlisted in the Navy in World War I. When he came home he shined shoes, sold newspapers, ran errands, and worked as a janitor and stenographer to earn money for his education.

He graduated from Cumberland University with a law degree in 1921 and began the practice of law in Wichita Falls.

When Allred was in the Navy he told friends he was going back to Texas and run for Governor. A talented and fiery lawyer and vigorous orator, he was quickly on his way to a political career that led to Governor and Federal judge.

Gov. Pat Neff appointed him assistant district attorney for Wichita, Archer, and Young Counties in 1923. A year later he was elected district attorney when only 25 years old.

He made his first bid for State office in 1926 as a candidate for attorney general in the Democratic primary. He lost but on his second try in 1930 he defeated the incumbent, Robert Lee Bobbitt, by a substantial majority.

During these busy years Allred met and courted Miss Jo Betsy Miller, of Wichita Falls, an accomplished pianist and graduate of Southern Methodist University. They were married on June 20, 1927.

Allred was reelected attorney general in 1932. During his two terms as attorney general, more suits were filed and tried by his office than any other up to that time.

He filed numerous antitrust suits including one for $17 million against 15 large oil companies and the American Petroleum Institute for alleged violations of the antitrust laws. The State lost, but Allred won many other antitrust cases.

Suits he filed recovered thousands of dollars in cash and valuable lands, including more than $1 million for the public-school fund.

One of his most notable achievements as attorney general was a victory in the U.S. Supreme Court over the right of Texas to control the flow of oil.

In 1934, firmly established on the political scene, Allred won the Democratic nomination for governor in a runoff with Tom Hunter by a majority of 40,000. He was elected to a second term without a runoff.

Allred's two terms as Governor, 1935–39, were maked by an effort to restore prosperity and to correct evils thought to have been responsible for the depression.

The old-age assistance amendment to the State constitution was adopted. It was followed by other social-security measures, including an amendment authorizing teacher retirement.

The old board of pardons was reorganized into the board of pardons and paroles; workmen's compensation was instituted for State employees and the salaries of the Governor, secretary of state, attorney general, comptroller, treasurer, and land commissioner were raised. Politically he was alined with President Franklin D. Roosevelt.

It was Roosevelt who dramatically took Allred out of politics temporarily. The President, making a whistle-stop tour in 1938, announced from the rear platform of his special train during a stop in Wichita Falls that he was appointing Allred a Federal judge.

Allred, however, finished out his term as Governor before becoming a judge of the U.S. District Court of South Texas.

Allred was a political foe of former Governor and U.S. Senator W. Lee O'Daniel. In June 1942 he resigned as Federal judge and announced he would oppose O'Daniel for reelection to the U.S. Senate.

O'Daniel won, and early in 1943 President Roosevelt nominated Allred as a justice of the court of appeals.

Objections were raised in Senate committee, and the nomination was withdrawn with Allred's consent.

Critics argued it was a "payoff" to Allred for his race against O'Daniel, a frequent opponent of the Roosevelt administration. Allred denied this, saying that President Roosevelt gave him no encouragement whatever in his senatorial campaign.

Allred practiced law privately in Houston until President Harry Truman appointed him to fill another vacancy on the bench of the U.S. District Court for South Texas.

Although Allred spent much of his time holding court at Laredo, Brownsville, Houston, and Victoria, the Allreds made it a point to return to Corpus Christi each Sunday except in extreme emergencies.

They were members of the First Christian Church there. Allred taught a Sunday school class for married couples and his wife a class for Latin American children.

Allred also received many honors during his life. In 1935 he was selected as the outstanding young man in America by the U.S. Shriners, Knights of Pythias, Odd Fellows, and Lambda Chi fraternity.

Among tributes to Allred, Garland Adair, curator of Texas Memorial Museum, recounted Friday that Allred, as Governor, made the Memorial Museum a reality. Allred in 1935 signed a State $3 million appropriation bill for the 1936 Texas centennial, which included $250,000 for the museum. Then the State secured matching Federal funds to supplement the State appropriation.

"If it had not been for Governor Allred's efforts and leadership," Adair said, "we would never have built Memorial Museum."

HARD CAMPAIGNER—ALLRED'S MAGNETISM WAS HARD TO RESIST

(By Dade Cheavens)

AUSTIN.—Political writers who followed Jimmie Allred on Texas campaign trails found his personal magnetism hard to resist.

The fiery orator of the late 1920's and 1930's who looked and acted like a young man until the day he died was so persuasive that they had to force themselves to write objectively.

That warmth had a way of radiating through audiences in his days and nights on the stump. Allred really loved people and he loved to talk.

BEST AT RALLIES

In the days before television and when radio speeches were still somewhat of a novelty, the youthful Allred turned all the blazing power of his personality full force into the listening crowd. He was at his best at a rally on the courthouse square.

Allred would build up toward an oratorical climax with all the fervor of a revivalist at such a rally, then appeal to his audience to join with him as "messengers of truth." After the speech, he would leap from the rostrum into the crowd and shake hands and talk as long as anyone would stay.

Then after the drum beating was over, he would sit up for hours in a cafe or hotel lobby and swap yarns with newsmen.

On one of these occasions, he told how he decided to run some day for governor.

It was soon after his graduation from Bowie High School, where he had been a mediocre but eager debater. Allred had quit a draft-exempt job to join the Navy. He and three hometown friends were dreaming aloud of their future in their barracks at San Francisco.

"I was thinking of home and how much I loved Texas," Allred said. "I knew it was a long way off, but I said: 'Some day I'm going home and run for governor.' And I did."

Allred was a package of nervous energy, and driving force.

ALWAYS RESTLESS

He was always restless and impatient of delay. Early in his public career he decided that the way to get things done in government was to challenge young men of ability to join him in public service. One of these, for example, was Bob Anderson, now Secretary of the Treasury.

Anderson was known as the unofficial chief of Allred's Austin "brain trust of bright young men." He had gone into public life originally as an assistant attorney general under Allred.

The Allred administration was trying to pick up the pieces from the depression and one important step was passage of the Unemployment Compensation Commission Act. Anderson wrote it. Helping him was a young legislator named Allan Shivers.

Both Shivers and Anderson alined themselves politically with the Republicans in later years. But politically Republicans were Allred's bitterest enduring enemies.

Allred was a deep-dyed New Dealer.

Franklin D. Roosevelt admired and respected him and named him to the Federal bench in 1939. After an interlude during which he resigned to try unsuccessfully to unseat W. Lee O'Daniel as U.S. Senator, Allred was named by Roosevelt to the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals at New Orleans. When objections were raised in Senate committee, Roosevelt withdrew the nomination at Allred's request. President Truman appointed him as Federal district judge in 1949.

During the stormy Democratic split in 1944, Allred was one of the chief behind-the-scenes strategists for the loyalist or New Deal group that ultimately won party control over the conservatives.

Allred was also active in the background as an adviser in Dr. Homer P. Rainey's unsuccessful bid as a liberal for the governorship.

INTEREST NEVER LAGGED

Win or lose, Allred's interest in politics never lagged. Reporters could rely on him for reliable information if he had it. He avoided active participation after he became a Federal judge, but he almost always knew what was going on.

Close friends said one of his most difficult decisions was against seeking a third term as Governor. But like many another Governor, he was reluctant to close the door on any future action.

When he announced his decision not to try again for Governor, he said:

"Of course, it is my nature to feel the tingle and desire for political conflict. * * * In the future, should the occasion arise, I always shall stand ready to serve the State I love."

PARTY WAS ALLRED'S LAST

(By Richard M. Morehead)

AUSTIN, TEX.—Few people could enjoy a farewell party as James V. Allred did here shortly before his death.

Nobody knew at the dinner honoring Allred here on September 4 that it was a farewell to the dynamic political figure.

But Jimmy—as most friends called him whether he was Governor or Federal judge—was in rare form.

Some 100 of Allred's friends, mostly men and women who served with him as attorney general in 1931–35, dined in the historic Driskill Hotel's Crystal Ballroom.

The black-haired, fast-talking Allred was in rare form. He introduced every guest present, and gave personal reminiscences of many of them. Some of the friendships dated back to his youth. Nearly all had been Allred's friends during his 30 years of public life.

Multiple services have been planned for Allred, 60, who died Thursday shortly after leaving court at Laredo.

The first service will be held in Corpus Christi at 4 p.m., Saturday in the First Christian Church.

His body will lie in state in the capitol rotunda Sunday afternoon. Hundreds of friends from all walks of life are expected to pass by his bier.

Final services are scheduled for 3 p.m. Monday at the First Christian Church in Wichita Falls where he began practicing law in 1921. Burial will follow in Riverside Cemetery there.

Allred's death left Texas with six living ex-Governors. They are William P. Hobby, Houston publisher, Governor in 1917–21; Miriam A. Ferguson, now living in Austin, Governor in 1925–27 and 1933–35; Dan Moody, Austin attorney, 1927–31; W. Lee O'Daniel, now in Dallas, 1933–41; Coke R. Stevenson, Junction rancher, 1941–47, and Allan Shivers, Austin business executive, 1949–57.

Allred symbolized the "New Deal" era in Texas politics. He helped to launch during the depression of the 1930's some of the social security programs that now are fixtures in State government.

These included the Texas Employment Commission, handling unemployment insurance and finding jobs for the jobless; the old-age assistance program now providing 225,000 checks monthly; and the department of public safety, founder of the modern State police department.

Nationally, Allred supported President Franklin D. Roosevelt and his "New Deal." They were good friends personally and politically. Allred was visiting the State capitol when President Roosevelt died, and he wept openly at the news.

In 1939, Roosevelt named him to the Federal bench as judge of the U.S. district court of south Texas. In 1942 Allred resigned and ran unsuccessfully against former Governor and U.S. Senator O'Daniel.

The next year the President nominated him as a justice of the U.S. Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals. Objections were raised by O'Daniel and others and the nomination was withdrawn with Allred's consent. Former President Harry Truman appointed Allred as Federal district judge in 1949.

JAMES V. ALLRED: "HE LIVED FULL THROTTLE"

(By Dave Shanks)

Early in August of 1934, just after the July Democratic primaries, James V. Allred pointed his car toward Dallas. He hoped to muster support for his runoff gubernatorial campaign against Tom Hunter, also of Wichita Falls, and the highest vote getter in the first primary.

Flipping on his car radio, Allred heard an announcer read from his news script an exclusive story that Capitol Correspondent Raymond Brooks of The American-Statesman had broken only minutes before in the afternoon newspapers at Waco.

"Ferguson machine and Klan "X's" are setting up Hunter's campaign," Brooks had reported.

Allred had needed an issue for his campaign. This was to be his. And at 35, he moved from the "little frame cottage on a dusty street (on Avenue F in North Austin)" to the mansion, the second youngest Governor in Texas' history.

Brooks recalls the incident, a part of the lore that grew up in Allred's phenomenally successful career, ended Thursday by death.

Hunter's victory had been so conclusive that his editors decided to send Brooks to Wichita Falls to interview Hunter and his family. He stopped for coffee at Waco's Roosevelt Hotel, where he met an acquaintance, a known Hunter supporter.

The friend had asked if Brooks "was going to the meeting in Marlin?"

"Sure," answered Brooks, "and you can ride with me if you will show me the way."

Brooks was unaware of any meeting, but he ducked through the kitchen, and, following instructions, went to Marlin.

There he saw numerous backers of Gov. Jim Ferguson who thought their meeting was secret and anyone attending surely was invited.

Brooks even served as "secretary," and he stuffed in his pocket the only list of names of the chairmen picked when he began his race to beat the newspaper deadlines at Waco.

In the backview of politics, Allred agreed that the news story tilted the election in his favor. And Hunter, speaking in Austin, oratorically tarred and feathered Brooks.

Others in Austin add to the Allred-ana, a record built during two terms as attorney general and two terms as Governor.

Ed Clark, once Allred's secretary (administrative assistant) and secretary of state, recalls their first meeting, in the courthouse at San Augustine. "He had come to town, running for the first time for attorney general."

"Jimmie was the last of the whirlwind campaigners, one of those who could get out the voters to the courthouse squares in Texas," says Clark.

Allred, says Clark, was one of the few politicians who "believed in being for the little fellow when it wasn't politically popular."

"He had no fear of 17 major oil companies and only asked his assistants in the attorney general's office: 'Are you sure they violated the law?'"

Allred was popular, but he had his political enemies. "Jimmie had strong friends and bitter enemies," says Clark. "There were people in this town who wouldn't speak to him."

With the humor that retrospect sometimes permits, Clark laughs about the speeches Senator T. J. Holbrook of Galveston (now of Austin) made on the senate floor, "Every morning * * *," grins Clark, "but ask the senator about it."

Senator Holbrook acknowledges the speeches. But he and Allred were personal friends. Only recently, at Holbrook's suggestion, a Dallas newspaper had prepared biographies of the seven living governors. Because of this, Holbrook and Allred had recently corresponded.

"He was sincere and had to take up all of the social problems of the State in his administration," recalls Holbrook, who remembers Allred as a person who compiled an "unparalleled political career in Texas."

Clyde Smith, Texas Supreme Court justice, first met Allred in his unsuccessful campaign for attorney general. "Jimmie was driving a Model T," recalls Judge Smith, who admired Allred's ability to "like people and have them like him." He remembers Allred's pleasure in attending the softball games, which the Governor, Gerald Mann and Smith frequently attended.

RALPH YARBOROUGH, U.S. Senator, a one-time Allred assistant attorney general, says the former Governor and U.S. judge "was a man who walked with kings but never lost the common touch or his interest in the man on the street."

"What higher tribute to Jimmie Allred can Texans pay than to recognize him as a man to be remembered in the same breath with Jim Hogg and Sam Houston?"

Herman Jones, who served in two Allred legislatures and later became a personal friend, credits Allred with using the special session as a legislative tool.

Allred wanted to repeal horseracing in Texas, and the issue had wallowed through two regular sessions. Allred called a special session, flatly rejected all requests for additional legislation "until the bill is on my desk."

As an orator, Jones says, Allred had a voice with a pitch a little higher than normal and it lacked the deep resonance of some of the others.

"It wasn't especially pleasant to hear," he continues, "but Jimmie could make a crowd yell, 'Pour it on 'em, Jimmie,' more times than you can count."

Jones traveled with Allred on some of his speaking tours for the National Democratic Committee.

"Jimmie could never pass by a newspaper * * * he would buy as many as 14 * * * we would laugh about it, and he would say, 'I just haven't read 'em.'"

Allred was a kind man, one who rarely forgot the incidents important to his friends.

Jones remembers a tour the two had planned for the National Democrats into New Mexico. Gov. Clyde Tingley had set up the itinerary, and since he was a candidate himself, he set the course for his own liking.

"It just happened Tingley stood real well in Carlsbad; so, that wasn't on the list of towns."

But Jones, anticipating a letter from a sweetheart, had told her to write him at Carlsbad.

"Allred headed the car south from Roswell, and we made the 110 mile round trip—but didn't find a letter there."

Years later, en route to California, Allred stopped in Carlsbad long enough to write a post card to Jones: "The letter still hasn't come."

Jones observes that Allred served in the executive and judicial branches of the government, but never in the legislative branch.

"Allred was such an advocate of the people that I'm sure he would have served best in a legislature," says Jones.

Said one friend of Allred: "He lived full throttle."

AUSTIN TRIBUTE—MINISTERS PRAISE ALLRED IN CEREMONY AT CAPITOL

AUSTIN.—Former Governor and Federal Judge James V. Allred was eulogized as a fighter for the underdog in a memorial service Sunday in the State senate chamber.

Ministers conducting the service lauded him as a man of vision, faith, courage, and tremendous energy who lived his ideals.

Allred's body was carried into the capitol, where he served 4 years as attorney general and 4 years as Governor, by an honor guard from the 149th Military Policy Company of the Texas National Guard.

FINAL TRIBUTE

The body lay in state from 2 p.m. until 4 p.m. while hundreds of State officials, former associates and old Austin friends streamed past the casket to pay final tribute.

"The most exciting event in creation is when the goodness that comes from God breaks out in the life of a man," said the Rev. Lawrence Bash, pastor of the University Christian Church.

"We face the core of reality when the goodness of God reveals itself in a man such as Jimmy Allred.

MAN OF INTEGRITY

"His humble beginning made him a fighter for the underdog. He was compelled to live always close to the average man. Allred was a man who preserved his integrity throughout his public career, an integrity which was based on his faith. He was a true Christian and churchman."

Assisting the Rev. Mr. Bash was Dr. John Barclay, pastor of the First Christian Church, of Austin.

Allred died Thursday of a heart attack at Laredo.

The first of three funeral services was held for him Saturday in Corpus Christi.

PAUSE IN AUSTIN

The funeral cortege en route to Wichita Falls paused in Austin for a memorial service attended by more than 300 persons, including high State and National figures.

Under a State police escort, Allred's body was taken Sunday afternoon to Wichita Falls, where final rites will be held Monday at 3 p.m. in the First Christian Church. Burial will be in Riverside Cemetery.

The solemn memorial service in the senate chamber was attended also by many old and close friends, and many who were in State service while Allred was Governor, 1935–39.

Among those at the service were Governor and Mrs. Daniel, former Governor and Mrs. Dan Moody, and Senators Lyndon B. Johnson and Ralph Yarborough.

ALLRED REVISITED—A TIME TO REMEMBER

(By Ronnie Dugger)

CORPUS CHRISTI.—Jimmy Allred used to be a shoeshine boy and a sailor, an attorney general and a Governor. He used to slam his opponents around and fight the trusts and demand new taxes on oil and gas and sulfur. Now it's Judge Allred, and when he's not hearing evidence or handing down decisions in his Federal court here, he's watering the flower seeds his wife indefatigably plants, or reading novels of the West, or teaching a Sunday school class.

Jimmy Allred has retired from politics, but his time was a time to remember, and this is an effort to.

When he became Governor in 1934, tens of thousands of Texans lived in "the jungles" under the river bridges, on the banks, in the woods. There were 250,000 Texas families on relief. In San Antonio, Maury Maverick helped the homeless organize life in abandoned warehouses, gave them jobs tearing up old freight cars and selling the scrap.

These were the desperate times. Mayor Oscar Holcombe, of Houston, had to tell a legislative committee that unless a relief measure was passed, his police would have to fire on the mobs, but they wouldn't because their brothers would be in the mobs. Oscar Powell, a San Antonio lawyer, turned to a friend and said, "If this thing doesn't pass, I'm wiring my wife to leave town." It passed.

Allred's years as Governor—1935–39—were, as he put it when he stepped down, "the pioneer age in social security in Texas." In one sphere, State policies were miniatures of the New Deal. In another, unresolved conflicts between Allred and the legislature over taxation and control of lobbyists are mirrored in the issues of modern Texas politics.

GUNFIGHTS ON "SMOKY ROW"

Allred's parents, who were from Grayson County, moved in a prairie schooner to a homestead on the frontier of Childress County. They lived in a dugout for a time—it was primitive those days around Childress—and they lost a baby girl on their retreat back to Bowie. Jimmy was born in Bowie in 1899.

He washed bottles for a bottling company, sold newspapers, shined shoes in a barber shop. He saw gun battles on Bowie's famous main street, "Smoky Row." The roughness of his youth conditioned him in a strange way, for later he was to abolish race track betting in Texas and became a teetotaler. In 1935, a news service said:

"Boyish observance of lawless saloons made him a teetotaler * * * His mother's hearty application of the rod when she overheard him and his brothers use the jargon of horse traders made him avoid both profanity and vile speech."

He enrolled at Rice Institute for a time, working as a filling station attendant to meet expenses. The double load was too much for him. He dropped out, got another job, then enlisted in the Navy in 1918. After the war he got a law degree at Cumberland's short-order law school in Tennessee.

He was appointed district attorney of Wichita Falls in the early twenties and brought some Ku Kluxers to trial for floggings. In 1926, a nobody, he ran for attorney general and missed election by 4,000 votes out of 766,000.

Soon thereafter he married Jo Betsy Miller, a music graduate of S.M.U.

A TEXAS TRUSTBUSTER

When the attorney general resigned, Gov. Dan Moody passed Allred by and chose Robert Lee Bobbitt. Allred shook his fist under the Governor's nose and promised to lick the proverbial socks off his appointee in the next election. He did.

As attorney general, he followed some advice that Dr. Robert Montgomery, one of his brain trusters, gave him. Montgomery, professor of economics at the University of Texas, and Vann Kennedy, a political savant also chose to Allred, conferred with the new legal officer 2 days after his election. Montgomery recalls that he advised Allred to pick up where Jim Hogg left off in 1894—monopolies, the trusts, the utilities.

Allred filed an antitrust suit against the major oil producers of the United States on grounds that the oil marketing code permitted a trust and monopoly in Texas in violation of its laws. By 1932 they had been fined $16 million.

He enjoined fly-by-night insurance corporation from operating in the State. That, of course, has a contemporary ring.

He ruled that Negroes could not vote in Democratic primaries—a ruling that was to cause him political trouble later.

Elected to a second term without trouble, by 1934 he had become the dominant figure in Texas politics. His antitrust policy marked him as the kind of economic liberal that was at that time in demand in policy-making councils.

TWENTY-ONE YEARS AGO

Seven men ran for Governor in 1934. The theses and history books are full of the vituperation and mudslinging that is standard equipment in Texas elections, but Allred's platform had a clear, substantive ring to it.

One of the ironies of that year from the present perspective was his condemnation of lobbyists in Austin and the practice of legislators taking retainer fees from private interests.

Here is how Texas Political Historian S. S. McKay recapitulates this plank in his platform:

"He favored a definite fight to relieve the State of lobbyists. His plan was to have all candidates for State office required to file a list of all employments or retainers during the year immediately preceding their announcement; also, that members of the legislature should be required to file at the beginning of their terms of office and once a month thereafter a list of clients by whom they were retained and the amount of retainers they were paid. A further safeguard was suggested * * * whereby all lobbyists should be required to file sworn statements telling the names of their employers, the amounts of money they received, and the manner in which it was spent."

In the 54th legislature, 21 years later, Senator William Shireman, of Corpus Christi, introduced a bill which would have accomplished almost exactly what Allred wanted on retainer fees; and Representative Maury Maverick, Jr., of San Antonio, introduced another one which would have required lobbyist registration almost precisely as Allred had proposed it.

Allred told the legislature in January 1935, that he favored "a real lobby regulation law and a law requiring periodical disclosures under oath by members of the legislature and other State officers as to their employment and retainers."

The legislature, of course, did nothing, even as they did nothing in 1955. At Allred's inaugural in 1937, he said, rather indirectly, that "the hand of privilege must be kept from the halls of government," but apparently by that time he had accepted the facts of Austin life.

READY FOR A NEW CYCLE

The social programs Allred advocated in his 1934 campaign included relief to the needy, an old-age pension system, an expanded education system, and full recognition of the rights of organized labor. He was for full support of President Roosevelt.

Later in the decade, he said he felt that prohibition was not an intelligent solution of the drinking problem, but personally he was a dry. In 1934, he wanted to submit to the people the question of the repeal of prohibition. He also wanted to outlaw racetrack gambling, which had been legalized in Texas in 1933.

He wanted a balanced budget. The State was $10 million in the red. By the time he packed up and left the Governor's mansion 4 years later, it was $20 million.

He was adamant against Federal control of natural gas production. In this he opposed the New Deal.

Dr. Montgomery's counsel was heeded on public utilities, and Allred advocated a utility commission empowered to make rates based on actual investment, to eliminate large sums paid utilities for services, and to set rates.

On January 15, 1935, the 36-year-old Governor told the legislature and 6 million Texans:

"Too many of our citizens are on relief rolls; and fear clutches at the hearts of even those fortunate enough to be employed. * * * We are ready for a new cycle of progress."

[From the Texas Observer, July 4, 1955]

TAX FIGHT IS 21 YEARS OLD

CORPUS CHRISTI.—In 1934, Gov. Jimmy Allred laid down a philosophy of State taxation which to this day polarizes the conservatives and the liberals under the capitol dome.

Allred, now living a relatively peaceful life as a Federal district judge in Corpus Christi, sent a message to the legislature 2 months after his inauguration appealing for natural resources tax increases, an income tax, and other tax forms which he believed were directed at interests that were making piles of money in Texas without making adequate contributions to the cost of government.

As late as 1955, in the 54th legislature, legislators were arguing about exactly the same taxes Allred proposed 21 years ago.

Not even the urgent financial needs of the depression and a growing State deficit could weaken the legislature's tenacious defense of out-of-State industrial interests.

Allred started from the proposition that property taxes were first levied in a time when most everybody lived on farms but that by 1934 they had become unfairly burdensome on farm and homeowners.

He knew full well that his proposals would provoke the most powerful opposition.

"In equalizing the tax burdens you and I are going to tread on somebody's toes," he said. But something simply had to be done.

Out-of-State chainstores had developed into interstate monoliths, doing huge business without having to pay taxes which businesses organized inside State lines were paying. Allred proposed a graduated chainstore tax, based on the amount of gross revenues and the number of stores in the chain.

NATURAL RESOURCES EYED

Texas was producing almost half of the crude petroleum in the United States. About 85 percent of that crude oil was being consumed beyond the boundaries of Texas. Texas consumers had to pay 4 cents a gallon on gasoline—a sum that did not change until 1955—but out-of-State consumers of Texas gasoline contributed nothing in sales taxes to the Texas treasury.

Allred proposed a study to see if the tax on crude oil should be revised. Depletion of the resources was one factor, he said; so also was the fact that "the oil industry is a moneymaking industry even in the midst of these dark days of economic depression."

He also recommended a flat tax on natural gas of 1 cent per thousand cubic feet, a severance tax of the type which finally passed in 1951, only to be declared unconstitutional.

A large part of Texas natural gas production was, and is, shipped out of State through pipelines. Of the money his natural gas of 1 cent per thousand cubic feet, mated that less than one-sixth would be paid by the citizens of Texas and approximately five-sixths by those outside the State.

Turning to sulfur and pipelines, Allred exhibited some of the antimonopolistic fervor which seems to have been melted by the production emergencies of the war and the postwar boom.

He said that two companies had a virtual monopoly on sulfur production and have made stupendous profits. He wanted their State tax raised—not nominally, but substantially.

"The shocking evil * * * of giant integrated concerns engaged in the production, transportation, and sale of natural gas" was, he said, even more pronounced in the oil business. He pointed out that in 1934, while operating at a loss in the refining and marketing ends of the business, 20 pipeline companies reported to the Secretary of State a total net profit of more than $78 million. One company made $13 million, another $11 million, another $10 million. These profits were—even in 1934—an average of 25 percent profit in 1 year on their investments.

He wanted a franchise tax of 1 percent against the gross assets of pipeline companies, both oil and gas. This would have given the State one seventy-eighth of their combined net profits.

Allred also wanted to increase the inheritance tax rate, and he spoke of a State income tax as "one of the fairest and most equitable levies that the State could make."

INCOME VERSUS SALES TAXES

He contrasted an income tax, based on ability to pay, with a general sales tax, "a tax on poverty."

Under a 2-percent general sales tax, he said, people with an income of $1,000 or less would pay $12.18 per thousand dollars of income, while people with an income of $1 million a year would pay only 20 cents per thousand dollars.

"To illustrate: the chief proponents of a sales tax are the chief opponents of an income tax," he said. "They advocate a 2-percent sales tax which is nothing more than a 2-percent income tax on the average man because he is compelled to spend all he makes for the necessities of life." Lobbyists for the utilities, investment bankers, the Mellon interests and others are the chief forces working for the sales tax, he said.

Allred did not object to a selective luxury tax on retail sales on grounds that it was a tax on privilege and wealth. But he fought a sales tax during his entire tenure as Governor.

The legislature listened to Allred's plan. It was well received editorially. But the legislature, too, knew what would happen. The newspapers of the time do not relate it, but one does not have to be a veteran in Austin to imagine what the lobbyists started doing to protect the interests of their clients.

The legislators did not pass any new natural resources taxes.

They did not pass a graduated chainstore tax.

They did not pass an income tax or increase the inheritance tax.

The chief source of new revenue was new alcohol taxes that poured into the Treasury upon the death of prohibition.

Sales tax forces also failed to put over their program.

The result: a $10 million deficit at the start of Allred's term had become a $20 million deficit when he went out of office in 1939.

There has been no fundamental change in the structure of power politics in Austin since the defeat of Allred's tax philosophy.

In 1955, the legislature refused to raise natural resources levies and passed new sales taxes on gasoline, beer, and cigarettes.

Isolated cries were heard at the House microphones and on the Senate floor that this was the biggest step toward a general sales tax in Texas history.

JAMES ALLRED

(By Ronnie Dugger)

The death of a great Governor, like the death of a great President, moves us to think on our country, how it is fine, and brings forth and uses its fine people. Jimmy Allred has not been put into many of the books that teach our students their heritage in Texas; he was too lately successful for the many who are forgetful at the expense of the few who remember. But he lived among us, and he was one of ours. We are reassured about our genuine attributes as a people and a Nation, first, that men come forward from among us who are brave, devoted, and unorthodox, Jefferson, Jackson, and Lincoln, Houston, Hogg, and Allred; and second, that these men reflect, as they refract, the impulses which hold us together as a people, personal freedom, popular faith, and the righteous fight. Perhaps it is better to have lived in such a man's time, even for those who, after he had done his main work, betrayed it, perhaps it is better simply to have been among those who knew he had done the main work and was living still as a judge in Corpus Christi, than it will be for those who must sense him from the books he will take his place in. People would speak of how he drank coffee in a coffee shop each morning in Corpus, and it was strange, almost wasteful, for he who was so much to the people he lived among to live in any particular way in any particular place. For he, James Allred, did enough for us all, in his time, which chose to use him, and found him true, that we gave to him that highest compliment we have in our power and wisely mostly withhold, our love of the ideal.

[From the Corpus Christi Caller]

JUDGE JAMES V. ALLRED: FIGHTING HUMANITARIAN

There are some who will remember James V. Allred as a crusading district attorney general of Texas. Others will think of him as a reform Governor who eliminated legalized betting on horseracing, set up a liquor control system after the end of prohibition, established the State's first parole supervision plan and led Texas through some of the most difficult days of the great depression.

None will remember him more thankfully, though, than a lot of little people who confronted him in his capacity as a Federal judge. They are the ones to whom he gave the oath of allegiance and conferred U.S. citizenship, a duty he cherished above most others. They are the ones who found him interposing his great power as a magistrate to protect them from the tyranny of a bureaucracy. They are the ones who heard him say, "I'm going to give you another chance," granting them probation rather than sending them to prison.

The humanity that he brought to the courtroom perhaps can be exemplified best by one incident. He had before him a youth who was charged with evading the draft. He dismissed the charge on condition that the youth enter the Armed Forces. Two and one-half years later the grateful youth wrote him: "Your true understanding of my situation 2½ years ago straightened out my life. You are a kind and generous man."

The driving force that took James V. Allred from humble beginnings to the Governor's office never left him when he reached the comparative security of the Federal bench. He drove himself harder than he did the lawyers who appeared in his court. Yet he still found time for a host of church and civic duties. He worked unceasingly for better understanding and cooperation between the races.

The State and Nation will miss an able and dedicated public servant. South Texas will mourn also the loss of a great humanitarian and an outstanding citizen.

[From the San Antonio (Tex.) Light, Sept. 29, 1959]

JAMES ALLRED

The career of James V. Allred was an example of the opportunity which awaits any intelligent and ambitious young man who is willing to work hard and make sacrifices.

After serving in the Navy in World War I, he shined shoes, sold newspapers, ran errands and worked as a janitor and as a stenographer to pay for his education.

Allred got his law degree from Cumberland University in 1921 and went on to become attorney general, Governor of Texas and a Federal district judge.

Gov. Price Daniel has called the death of James Allred "a great loss to the State he loved" and has said that "he will long be remembered for his years of devoted public service."

Senator RALPH YARBOROUGH characterized him as "the most eloquent champion of the people of Texas of our generation."

[From the Abilene Reporter-News]

JIMMY ALLRED'S LONG, COLORFUL CAREER ENDS

Those who remember Jimmy Allred in his heyday as a political figure in Texas will have no trouble recalling the dynamic personality of the man, his tireless energy, and his way with a crowd. He was in the field of Texas politics pretty much what Jimmy Cagney was at the height of his career as an actor—full of sparkle and as lively as a cricket.

It is hard to realize that he is dead at 60 of a heart attack.

James V. Allred, a native of Bowie, was an assistant district attorney in Wichita, Archer, and Young Counties at 23, and at 25 had been elected one of the youngest district attorneys in Texas. He was still under 30 when he tried for attorney general, but that time he missed. Nothing dismayed, he tried again in 1930 and was elected by a firm majority—the youngest man ever elected to that post, an important one in Texas. He was reelected in 1932, and 2 years later in a crowded field of gubernatorial candidates he went into the runoff with Tom Hunter and came out the victor by 40,000 votes in a ding-dong contest. They were both residents of Wichita Falls at the time, and Allred was the first west Texan ever elected Governor, if our memory is on straight.

On completion of his second term he was named a Federal district judge by Franklin D. Roosevelt. In 1942 he resigned the Federal post to challenge an old political foe, W. Lee O'Daniel, for Governor, but "Pappy" won the nomination.

A few months later, in 1943, President Roosevelt again named him to a Federal judgeship, this time the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals, but the Senate Judiciary Committee refused a favorable report.

But Jimmy Allred had a habit of coming back. In 1951 President Truman appointed him as judge of the Federal district of south Texas, a position he held at the time of his death.

With his second ascension to the Federal bench, Jimmy Allred took himself out of Texas politics and went about his duties without the fanfare that had marked his earlier career. As attorney general and Governor he was colorful and lively, and never ducked a fight.

Not many men, if any, ever received three appointments to the Federal bench—the second with considerable controversy—but Jimmy Allred did.

In the late 1920's he proved, along with Dan Moody, that a young man of purpose and courage had a place in Texas politics. Like Moody, he served as attorney general and Governor at a time when Texas politics really sizzled.

JAMES V. ALLRED

Within a life span of three-score years, James V. Allred served as Texas attorney general, Governor and Federal judge. Previously he had been an assistant district attorney and district attorney of Wichita, Archer and Young Counties, and in World War I served in the Navy.

In this active career Jimmie Allred, as he was widely known, demonstrated tremendous energy, competitive spirit, outstanding ability and many other traits useful in his service to State and Nation. As attorney general, he was proud of the development of promising young men on his staff. Among them was Bob Anderson, now Secretary of the Treasury.

As attorney general, Judge Allred set a record in filings of suits, and among notable victories was a case in which the U.S. Supreme Court affirmed the right of the State to control the flow of oil. As a two-term Governor, 1935–39, he sponsored many recovery measures, and during his tenure the State constitutional amendments for teacher retirement and old age assistance were approved.

Judge Allred twice was appointed Federal judge, resigning in 1942 to make an unsuccessful race against then U.S. Senator W. Lee O'Daniel. He was reappointed to the Federal bench in 1949. Judge Allred made a fine record as a Federal judge, and his death comes at a time when there is a serious shortage of U.S. trial judges.

Judge Allred won many honors in his public career, among them his selection in 1935 by the junior chamber of commerce as the outstanding young man in America. He had a broad circle of friends extending from the White House to the local precinct. As a liberal, his political fortunes varied with the times. His public service was fruitful and above reproach, and Texas has reason to be proud of him.

STATE LOSES ABLE SERVANT IN DEATH OF JUDGE ALLRED

Although he had been a prominent figure in Texas' turbulent politics for many years, when James V. Allred became a Federal district judge he left politics behind and won the nonpartisan praise of lawyers for his ability and conduct on the bench.

The State has lost a devoted public servant in his death.

The trait which probably was most responsible for Allred's great success in Texas politics was his winsome, forthright personality. He was broadminded and tolerant, respecting the views of others as he wanted them to respect his views.

He was loyal to his friends, even when it was more expedient not to be. He was, however, politically astute and had an unusual ability to gauge public opinion.

Born in Bowie, of a pioneer Texas family, he served a hitch in the Navy after high school, then worked his way through Cumberland University in Tennessee to get a law degree. He was interested in public service when he was still in his teens. He was appointed district attorney in the Wichita Falls district in 1923 and elected to the office in 1924. He ran for attorney general in 1926, lost by a small margin and came back in 1930 to win. Four years later he was elected Governor, serving two terms. A strong supporter of President Roosevelt, Allred was appointed a Federal district judge in 1938, resigned to run for the U.S. Senate in 1942 and lost, then was appointed to the Federal bench again in 1949 by President Truman.

[From the Houston Post, Sept. 26, 1959]

Judge James V. Allred left a varied record of distinguished public service that spanned a period of 36 years. It began in 1923 when, at the youthful age of 24, he became district attorney of Wichita, Archer and Young Counties. It ended Thursday when, as U.S. judge for the southern district of Texas, he died suddenly at the age of 60.

From the springboard of a successful administration as district attorney, he leaped into the 1926 race for attorney general without financial support and almost defeated the incumbent, Claude Pollard of Houston, an established, well-known lawyer and public official.

In 1930 he tried again and won. After serving two terms as attorney general, he was elected Governor, and for 4 hard years grappled with the problems of the depression and its economic aftermath.

At the end of his gubernatorial administration, in 1939, he was appointed U.S. district judge by President Franklin D. Roosevelt. In 1942 he again succumbed to the call of politics, resigning to become a candidate for the U.S. Senate. This time he lost, but 7 years later he was again appointed to the Federal district court by President Harry S. Truman.

In political affairs, as in the legal profession, the virile, handsome Jimmy Allred was an aggressive, colorful contender and advocate. One of his most potent assets in both arenas was his gift of oratory; he was one of the most eloquent speakers in Texas public life. Newspapermen who accompanied him on speaking campaigns said he was one speaker they enjoyed hearing every time he spoke.

The step from the vigorous activities of politics and public service to the calm, impartial deliberations of the judiciary was a sharp transition. But members of the bar praised his fairness, as well as his judicial ability, and his reputation in that respect continued to grow through his years on the bench.

Although Judge Allred and his family moved to Corpus Christi after his second appointment to the judgeship, in order to be nearer the Victoria, Brownsville and Laredo divisions of his district, he was a resident of Houston in two different periods of his career. First, as a student of the Rice Institute in 1917–18, when he worked at a filling station to help pay his expenses. He left to enlist in the Navy in World War I, and thereafter, attended Cumberland University in Lebanon, Tenn.

Upon receiving his first judicial appointment, Allred moved his family to Houston. They lived here for about 10 years, and his gracious wife and three sons, along with the judge, won many friends in Houston.

These friends, with hosts of others over the State, will mourn the passing of one of the notable figures in Texas public life.

JAMES V. ALLRED

Only a few days ago those who had been associated with James V. Allred as attorney general and as Governor, held a reunion in his honor when he revisited Austin to take part in dedication of the Texas Employment Commission Building.

The smiling, buoyant, youthful-appearing 60-year-old U.S. judge renewed old acquaintances and happily mingled with those whom he had appointed to office, those with whom he had served in State government. For all of them, it was their last meeting with the dynamic self-made former Wichita Falls lawyer, who had risen to eminence in State administration and in the Federal judiciary.

His sudden death at Laredo Thursday came as a profound shock.

His life was one of the storybook examples of achievement from humble beginnings through individual effort, initiative, and ability.

When he was a small boy, his family lived in an east Texas sod house. Later the family moved to west Texas, and the story, told in political campaigns, that he as a youngster shined shoes to earn money for school was never denied. He worked his way through a law school and began practice of law in Wichita Falls. He served as attorney general, then won a spectacular race against a fellow townsman, Tom F. Hunter, for Governor. He succeeded Mrs. Miriam A. Ferguson, at the close of her second administration.

He was the only Texas Governor designated as a liberal, in the identification of the term with the New Deal philosophy under which President Roosevelt sought to rescue the Nation, and Allred helped to pull the State from the abyss of the depression.

After he completed two terms as Governor, succeeded by W. Lee O'Daniel, Allred was appointed by President Roosevelt as a Federal district judge. When O'Daniel and others ran for the U.S. Senate, Judge Allred resigned his post and entered the race.

Political charges that there was a trade whereby President Roosevelt was simply giving the young judge a leave of absence from the bench to make the race were refuted when Roosevelt did not reappoint him after the race and Allred's defeat by O'Daniel.

Several years later, President Harry S. Truman gave him a new appointment to the Federal bench, for the south Texas district. Allred was presiding on the bench this week when stricken with the illness which proved fatal.

Allred became Governor at 35, second youngest in the State's history. Though he had behind him only his service as attorney general in State political office, his two terms as Governor constitute an administration which ranks high in solid and lasting achievements. Many problems of the depression were licked, and his administration saw Texas emerge from the blight of that black period, a growing and prosperous State.

He was a religious man who made his high moral and ethical principles a part of his everyday life and a part of the fabric of State government. In his later life, his service on the Federal bench has been in the best tradition of the judiciary.

James V. Allred, by his zeal, his ability, his integrity and his devotion to his State, has written a fine chapter in the chronicles of State government; his service on the bench has added to the lustre of the judiciary.

[From the Houston Press, Sept. 26, 1959]

JAMES V. ALLRED

James V. Allred—"Jimmy" to most Texans even after he achieved such distinguished rank as Governor of the State or Federal district judge—was a real life success story with few equals.

Jimmy was born of fine Texas people in Bowie and lived the typical life of a farm or small town boy around the turn of the century when small town life was vastly different from life now and while Texas was still Texas in all that name connoted in those days.

After graduating from high school in Bowie, he came to Houston to attend Rice Institute and worked in a filling station to pay his school expenses. Service in World War I followed and then Jimmy went to law school and started the practice of law at the age of 22.

The ability, the vigor and the personality of the young man soon became evident—and few people have ever risen as rapidly in public life as he did—a district attorney at 24—Texas attorney general at 30—and Governor of Texas at 35. At that time he was the youngest Governor in the Nation.

It is generally conceded that Governor Allred was one of the State's outstanding Governors. A vigorous man—a man of warmth—he piled up an outstanding record in depression years when filling the office of chief executive of any State was particularly difficult.

Some idea of what the people thought of him may be had from the fact that when he ran for reelection in 1936 he received more votes in the Democratic primary than his four opponents combined. He polled the largest vote recorded in the State up to that time.

Twice on the Federal bench, he filled that position with dignity and with effectiveness.

Over and above his accomplishments in public office—Jimmy Allred was a man whose personal life was outstanding. His warmth and his friendliness were noteworthy and he will be missed by many.

As a sort of footnote—yet worthy of mention for the great pleasure the idea has brought to millions of people—Jimmy can be considered as one of the founders of the roadside park idea in America.

Back during the depression years, LYNDON JOHNSON, now U.S. Senator and Democratic majority leader, was National Youth Administrator for Texas. LYNDON got the idea that it would be a good thing to have parks along main highways. He discussed the matter with Governor Allred—and as a result of this the roadside park came into being.

SHALL AMERICA'S BIRTHRIGHT BE SOLD FOR POTTAGE?

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, on December 11, 1959, the erudite and distinguished senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN] addressed the midwinter meeting of the Georgia Bar Association in Atlanta on the subject, "Shall America's Birthright Be Sold for Pottage?" With incomparable clarity, irrefutable logic, and characteristic eloquence, the Senator exposed the fallacies and dangers inherent in the continuing demands for the enactment by Congress of force legislation to regulate in the name of civil rights even the most minute and intimate details of American life. In view of the certainty that such demands will be made of this session of Congress, I think it would be well for all Members of this Senate to give careful study to the Senator from North Carolina's masterful presentation and, for that purpose, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of it be printed herewith in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SHALL AMERICA'S BIRTHRIGHT BE SOLD FOR POTTAGE?

(Address of Senator SAM J. ERVIN, JR., Democrat, of North Carolina, to the Georgia Bar Association at its midwinter meeting in Atlanta on Friday evening, December 11, 1959)

Ladies and gentlemen of the Georgia Bar, I am deeply grateful to your president, Newell Edenfield, for his invitation to be with you. It is a privilege for me to be in a State whose bench and bar share with me the abiding conviction that our governmental and legal systems constitute America's precious birthright.

I take this occasion to pay tribute to three great Georgians, Dick Russell, Herman Talmadge, and Charlie Bloch, who are fighting so gallantly and so intelligently to preserve that birthright for all Americans of all generations and all races.

I also take this occasion to express my appreciation of the judicial labors of the chief justice and associate justices of the supreme court of Georgia, who know that the late Justice Robert H. Jackson spoke truthfully when he said that there is "no way we can have equal justice under law except we have some law." They merit the thanks of all lovers of constitutional government for their unswerving fidelity to the fundamentals of the law.

I shall repeat here what I have often said elsewhere: DICK RUSSELL is the best qualified man in this country for the Presidency of the United States. Paradoxical as it may be, however, some of the most vocative champions of civil rights maintain that DICK RUSSELL has no civil right to aspire to that high office because his home happens to be in Winder, Ga., rather than Kalamazoo, Mich., or some other place above the Mason and Dixon's line.

Some years ago, Jim's administrator was seeking to hold a railroad company civilly liable for Jim's death on circumstantial evidence. The administrator called to the stand a witness who testified that he was walking along the railroad track just after the train passed and that he saw Jim's severed head lying on one side of the track and the remainder of Jim's body on the other. The counsel for the administrator then put this question to the witness: "What did you do after you discovered these gruesome relics?" The witness replied: "I said to myself, something serious must have happened to Jim."

THE CIVIL RIGHTS PROGRAM POSES A THREAT TO AMERICA'S BIRTHRIGHT—OUR GOVERNMENTAL AND LEGAL SYSTEMS

If the advocates of civil rights legislation have their way, something serious is going to happen to our governmental and legal systems. They are bent on selling America's birthright for a mess of pottage. I propose to talk to you about this.

In so doing, I am inspired by motives similar to those which prompted Job Hicks to commit the act which resulted in his conviction on the charge of disturbing religious worship in the superior court of Burke County, N.C., around the turn of the century.

John Watts took a notion that he was called to preach. John was skilled in the science of a bricklayer, but was sadly deficient in the art of an exhorter. He was nevertheless expounding the scriptures in a small rural church one Sunday, when Job Hicks, who had partaken too freely of Burke County corn, happened to stagger by. Upon seeing John in the pulpit, Job entered the church, dragged John to the door, and threw him out upon the ground. When Job Hicks was called to the bar to be sentenced for his offense, Judge Robinson, the presiding judge, remarked to him in a stern tone of voice: "Mr. Hicks, when you were guilty of this unseemly conduct on the Sabbath Day, you must have been so intoxicated as not to realize what you were doing." Job made this response to His Honor: "Well, Judge, I had had several drinks. But I would not want Your Honor to think I was so drunk I could stand by and see the Word of the Lord being mummicked up like that without doing something about it."

ADVOCATES OF PROGRAM DISTORT AND EXPLOIT RACIAL MISDEEDS OF SOUTHERNERS

When I became a member of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, I was assigned to its Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights, which has primary jurisdiction of civil rights bills. As a member of this subcommittee, I have learned some things concerning these bills and those who advocate them.

The constant agitation concerning racial matters and civil rights furnishes a happy hunting ground for opportunists who are willing to sell the truth to serve the hour. I wish to make it crystal clear, however, that I do not question the sincerity of the great majority of those who advocate the civil rights programs. They are undoubtedly conscientious men and women bent on doing what they believe to be good. But candor compels me to say that they do clarify what Josh Billings meant when he made this terse observation: "It is better to be ignorant than to know what ain't so."

The tragic truth is that most of the people who champion the civil rights program "know what ain't so" both in respect to the character of the program and the necessity for it.

The reasons for this are quite simple.

The greater part of these people do not read civil rights bills or study their implications. And even if they should undertake to do so, they would in all likelihood find themselves in a state identical with that of President Eisenhower, who honestly admitted at one of his press conferences that he does not understand "the legal quirks" in the bills. Civil rights bills are exceedingly complex, and can be rightly interpreted only when they are read in the light of history, the Constitution, and the basic rules of law and equity.

These considerations make it plain that most people must base their opinions in respect to the civil rights program on what others say or write, and are without the capacity to distinguish between the true and the false in what they hear or read concerning it. Much of what they hear or read on the subject is sheer propaganda emanating from those who find it agreeable or profitable for one reason or another to agitate racial problems and advocate civil rights legislation for their solution. As a consequence, many people believe that civil rights bills are as fair as the magic labels they bear, and remain unaware of the multitude of constitutional and legal sins they cover.

It is difficult to realize the injury done to the South and the threat posed to sound government in America by those who make it a profession to agitate the interracial misdeeds of southern whites.

Take the matter of crime. When an interracial or other crime is committed in a city of the North, it is simply a crime to be narrated in small print on page 17 of the metropolitan dailies and left to the criminal court for punishment in the normal course.

But let southern whites commit a crime upon a Negro in a remote region of the South. The professional agitators seize upon it and exploit it to the hilt. They charge all southerners with complicity in the crime, and call on Congress to rob the entire South and her officials and people of basic governmental and legal rights by civil rights laws repugnant to the Constitution ordained for all Americans. And, unfortunately for our country's sense of perspective and proportion, the professional agitators are sometimes aided and abetted by some gentlemen of the press, radio, and television, who ought to know better.

I was first made acutely aware of how much these things are out of joint while serving as a member of the platform committee at the Democratic National Convention in Chicago in 1956.

For several days those who make it a profession to agitate racial matters appeared before the committee, and vilified all southerners of Caucasian ancestry, charging them with personal responsibility for the atrocious murder of the Negro youth Till allegedly committed by two white men in a rural section of Mississippi some time before. They demanded that the platform of the Democratic Party pledge the enactment of civil rights laws sufficient in tenor to make legal pariahs of southerners, any provision of the Constitution of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding.

During the period in which these people were haranguing the committee two homicides took place in Chicago paralleling the Till murder in atrocity. These slaying attracted little public attention. Those who were agitating the Till case ignored them completely; and nobody anywhere was so unjust as to charge the law-abiding people of Chicago or other communities north of the Mason-Dixon line with complicity in them.

As I considered these things, I recalled the story of Don Marquis about Archy, the cockroach, who recorded his observations by jumping on the keys of a typewriter when its human owner was absent. On one occasion Archy told a story to illustrate his observation that human beings are past comprehending or explaining.

While going home, a man saw a hungry wolf seize a lamb and attempt to devour it. Incensed by its cruelty to the lamb, the man slew the wolf, and bore the lamb home in his bosom. On reaching home, the man slaughtered the lamb, and cooked it, and ate it for supper. Having had a good meal of lamb's meat, the man sat down before a comfortable fire to meditate. As he was meditating, the man thought of the cruelty of wolves to lambs, and broke down and wept.

SOUTHERNERS WHO WRONG NEGROES AID AND ABET THREAT TO AMERICA'S BIRTHRIGHT

I cannot forbear remarking at this point that those who seek to rob Southern States and their officials and people of basic governmental and legal rights by civil rights legislation incompatible with the Constitution established for all Americans have a fifth column in the South. The fifth column consists of southern whites who wrong Negroes. These southern whites commit a twofold wrong. First, they wrong the Negroes who are their victims; and, second, they lend aid and comfort to those who strive to defeat us in our fight to preserve America's birthright for all Americans of all generations and all races.

CIVIL RIGHTS PROGRAM CALLS FOR BAD LAWS—THE WORST SORT OF TYRANNY

Some thirty-odd civil rights bills are now pending before Congress. I give you this sincere and solemn assurance: None of them are wise. None of them are necessary. None of them are compatible with our basic governmental and legal institutions.

My opposition to these bills does not arise out of any matter of race. I have always maintained that all children of all races are entitled to adequate educational opportunities; that all men of all races are entitled to stand equal before the law; and that all qualified citizens of all races are entitled to vote.

Like Ulysses, all of us are a part of all we have met. As his son and law partner, I was closely associated with my father, who was a member of the North Carolina bar for 65 years. He implanted in my youthful heart a love of law and a hate of tyranny. All the things I have met since the days of my youth have intensified this love and this hate. I oppose the civil rights bills simply because bad laws are the worst sort of tyranny.

CIVIL RIGHTS PROGRAM UNWISE

The civil rights bills are unwise because they are based, in the final analysis, on the fallacious notion that members of the Negro race can law or legislate their way to first class citizenship and the better life. No man can law or legislate his way to these things. They are the rewards of personal industry and merit, and cannot be bestowed on anyone from on high, even by men wearing judicial robes or sitting in congressional seats. Anybody who maintains the contrary is either deceiving himself or attempting to deceive somebody else.

CIVIL RIGHTS PROGRAM UNNECESSARY

The civil rights proposals are not necessary for a very simple reason. There are existing Federal and State statutes sufficient to afford protection to the civil rights of all members of any race who are willing to depend for the protection of their rights upon the same just and uniform rules of law by which the rights of all other Americans are protected.

This observation indicates the fundamental defect, which permeates the whole civil rights program and which is revealed in all its stark reality when the program is read in the light of this wise declaration of the Supreme Court in the civil rights cases of 1883:

"When a man has emerged from slavery, and by the aid of beneficent legislation has shaken off the inseparable concomitants of that state, there must be some stage in the progress of his elevation when he takes the rank of a mere citizen, and ceases to be the special favorite of the laws, and when his rights, as a citizen or a man, are to be protected in the ordinary modes by which other men's rights are protected."

What is the fundamental defect in the entire civil rights program? It is simply this: The program selects certain groups of Americans out of all others on the basis of their race, and demands that members of the groups so selected be made special favorites of the laws and granted legal advantages and privileges which are denied to all other Americans.

This being true, the civil rights program is utterly repugnant to the American legal system, which rests upon the basic principle that laws must confer equal rights on all citizens and subject them to equal burdens if there is to be any justice under law.

Let us consider for a moment how the advocates of the civil rights program attempt to justify their demand that certain groups of Americans be made the special favorites of the laws. They advance the plea of necessity, which William Pitt, the younger, so well described as "the argument of tyrants" and "the plea for every infringement of human freedom."

They say that State and local officials in Southern States habitually deny Negroes the equal protection of the laws; that these officials cannot be brought to justice because southern jurors will not return verdicts adverse to white men in interracial cases; and that for these reasons existing Federal and State laws, which have proved sufficient in times past to protect the constitutional rights of all other Americans, are not adequate to protect the constitutional rights of Negroes in the South. By this unproved indictment of a whole people, they reach this conclusion: To prevent Southern States denying Negroes the equal protection of the laws, Congress must enact into law a civil rights program which makes Negroes the special favorites of the laws and robs State and local officials throughout the United States of the protection of equal laws.

I challenge the validity of this conclusion and the unproved indictment on which it rests.

By and large, State and local officials in the South act just as honorably and impartially as State and local officials in all other areas of the country. Recent verdicts in Arkansas, Florida, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, and other Southern States give the lie to the charge that southern jurors will not return verdicts adverse to white men in interracial cases.

To be sure, sometimes State and local officials in Southern States commit wrongs, and sometimes southern juries do not return true verdicts. The same thing can be said, however, of officials and juries in the North, the East, and the West, and everywhere else on earth where the administration of government and justice is confided to fallible human beings.

Despite this, certain things are true. Whenever a State or local official in a southern State denies any American of any race his constitutional rights, the official renders himself liable to civil suit and criminal prosecution in Federal and State courts, whose judges are completely devoted to the concept of the equality of all men before the law. If the litigant in the civil suit or the prosecuting attorney in the criminal prosecution can prove the truth of the charge according to just and uniform legal rules applicable to all like cases, it is just as certain as anything in human affairs can be made certain that justice under law will be done, regardless of the race of the American who has been wronged.

If those who wish to sue or prosecute distrust State courts for any reason, real or fancied, they have an absolute right to go directly to Federal district courts, which usually sit in places distant from the localities in which the deprivation of constitutional rights allegedly occur. Under the prevailing rules, the judges of these Federal courts act as judges of the facts as well as the law in most civil suits of this nature and have the power to tell jurors what they think the evidence shows in all cases, both civil and criminal, where a jury is required. The jurors are drawn from jury boxes prepared by Federal court officials.

CIVIL RIGHTS PROGRAM INCOMPATIBLE WITH AMERICA'S GOVERNMENTAL AND LEGAL INSTITUTIONS

This brings me to my claim that the civil rights bills are incompatible with America's basic governmental and legal institutions.

It is, perhaps, inevitable for civil rights bills to embody a multitude of constitutional and legal sins. Those who champion them are somewhat impatient men, who seek easy solutions to hard problems. In so doing, they devise shortcuts to the ends they desire, and are contemptuous of the obstacles they encounter, even though such obstacles be precious constitutional or legal principles. Their impatient zeal seems to blind them to a truth taught by the experience of mankind: Hard problems do not admit of easy solutions, and shortcuts are the most direct roads to disaster.

Their propensity to invent shortcuts is exhibited in graphic fashion by the recent recommendation of three members of the Civil Rights Commission that a 23d amendment be added to the Constitution. The proposed amendment is to abolish the historic constitutional power of the States to prescribe qualifications for voting, and establish a Federal standard for all elections held for any purpose anywhere in the United States. According to the Federal standard to be established by the proposed amendment, any citizen who meets "State age and length-of-residence requirements" is to have an absolute right to vote in any election if he has a living physical body, with or without intelligence and with or without character, and is not actually confined in an institution for mental defectives or a prison "at the time of registration or election."

When all is said, the reason assigned for this proposal to take from all the States their historic constitutional power to prescribe literacy tests and bar lunatics, idiots, and convicted felons from voting comes to this: Such action would make it easy to determine whether Negroes are unlawfully denied voting rights in some southern communities.

I do not deny that it would be easy to determine whether a person is legally qualified to vote if there were no legal qualifications for voting. But I do assert that for Congress and the States to add the proposed 23d amendment to the Constitution would be on a par with using an atomic bomb to get rid of a mouse.

THE CIVIL RIGHTS PROGRAM WOULD VEST IN THE ATTORNEY GENERAL THE ARBITRARY POWER TO MAKE SOME AMERICANS SPECIAL FAVORITES OF THE LAWS AND ROB OTHER AMERICANS OF THE PROTECTION OF EQUAL LAWS

Time does not permit me to enumerate all of the constitutional and legal sins in the pending civil rights bills. I have already pointed out that the entire civil rights program is repugnant to the basic principles upon which justice under law rests. I will confine my remaining remarks in the main to those inherent in the peculiar procedural devices designed to confer upon a single public officer, the Attorney General of the United States, the arbitrary power to make Negroes chosen by him the special favorites of the laws and rob State and local officials selected by him of the protection of equal laws.

If Congress should sanction these procedural devices, the Attorney General would possess colorable statutory authority to make a boast similar to that of the old justice of the peace who was exasperated by the tactics of a young lawyer trying his first case. The young lawyer kept rising and exclaiming: "I object. You are not proceeding according to law." Finally the old magistrate could stand it no longer. He shouted: "Young man, quit jumping up and saying 'I object. You are not proceeding according to law.' I'll have you to understand I am running this court. The law hasn't got a d—n thing to do with it."

The tragic truth illustrated by this story becomes obvious when these procedural devices are tested by our institutions of government and the principles on which they rest.

The men who framed the Constitution were exceedingly wise. They knew that the history of mankind in general and the English speaking race in particular revealed this eternal political truth: No man or set of men can be safely trusted with unlimited governmental power. Consequently, they were determined, above all things to establish a government of laws and not of men—a government in which laws should have authority over men, not men over laws.

To accomplish this end and thus prevent arbitrary action by the Federal Government, the framers of the Constitution used the doctrine of the separation of governmental powers in a twofold way.

They delegated to the Federal Government the powers necessary to enable it to discharge its functions as a central government and left to the States all other powers. It was this use of the doctrine of the separation of powers which prompted Chief Justice Salmon P. Chase to make this classic statement in Texas v. White (7 Wall. 700): "The Constitution, in all its provisions, looks to an indestructible Union composed of indestructible States."

In their other use of the doctrine of the separation of powers they divided the powers of the Federal Government among its three departments. They vested the power to make laws in Congress, the power to execute laws in the President, and the power to interpret laws in the Federal courts.

The men who framed the Constitution also knew that tyranny uses the forms of law to destroy those who oppose her will, and for this reason they inserted in the Constitution certain basic safeguards, such as the constitutional right of indictment by grand jury, and the constitutional right of trial by petit jury, to protect litigants from judicial tyranny. Congress subsequently augmented the safeguards for litigants by creating a statutory right of trial by jury in indirect contempt cases where the alleged contemptuous act constitutes a crime under Federal or State law, and the statutory right to the benefit of limited punishment in indirect contempt cases of a similar nature. According to recitations in some of the civil rights bills and the avowals of their supporters the primary objective of the proposed procedural devices is to make effective for Negroes the prohibition of the clause of the 14th amendment which forbids the States to deny to any persons within their jurisdictions the equal protection of the laws.

Under the proposed procedural devices the Attorney General is to be vested with the absolute discretionary authority to bring a new type of civil suit against States and local officials to prevent them from denying Negroes the equal protection of the laws on account of their race. For all practical intents and purposes the proposed procedural devices are to constitute the personal possession of the Attorney General, who is given no adequate standard to guide or control the exercise of his discretion and who may act or refuse to act according to his own unrestrained pleasure.

He may sue in one case and refuse to sue in other like cases. He may sue for some Negroes and refuse to sue for others similarly situated. He may sue some State or local officials and refuse to sue others allegedly guilty of like wrongs.

If the Attorney General elects to sue for certain Negroes he makes them the special favorites of the laws in several ways.

The Attorney General acts as their counsel. All other Americans are compelled to retain their own lawyers.

The cost of the litigation for their benefit is defrayed out of the Federal Treasury. All other Americans are compelled to pay the cost of litigation for their benefit out of their own pockets.

They are excused from compliance with State laws establishing administrative remedies for the wrongs of which they complain. These State laws remain binding on all other Americans who are compelled to exhaust the remedies they provide before they can seek relief in any court. And, finally, the State or local officials whom the Attorney General sues for their benefit are automatically robbed by indirection and an adroit perversion of equity processes of these basic safeguards created by the Constitution and Congress to protect all Americans from judicial tyranny: the constitutional right of indictment by grand jury; the constitutional right of trial by petit jury; the statutory right of trial by jury in indirect contempt cases where the contemptuous act constitutes a crime under Federal or State law; and the statutory right to the benefit of limited punishment in indirect contempt cases of a similar nature.

The civil rights bills which undertake to clothe the Attorney General with such absolute power are utterly repugnant to our institutions of government and the principles upon which they rest, which "do not mean to leave room for the play and action of purely personal and arbitrary power." (Yo Wick v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356).

They are incomplete and would constitute an unconstitutional delegation by Congress of its legislative power to the Attorney General if they should be enacted into law. This is true because they undertake to vest in the Attorney General absolute discretionary power, without standard or rule, to be exercised as he pleases. (Panama Refining Company v. Ryan, 293 U.S. 388.)

The enormity of this constitutional sin cannot be over-magnified. As the Supreme Court has often declared, the principle that Congress cannot delegate its legislative power to any department of the Government, executive or judicial, is "essential to the integrity and maintenance of the system of government ordained by the Constitution." (Marshall Field and Company v. Clark, 143 U.S. 649.)

CIVIL RIGHTS PROGRAM INCOMPATIBLE WITH SOUND FEDERAL-STATE RELATIONS

The civil rights bills which seek to establish the procedural devices under discussion contain another provision of major importance which cannot possibly be reconciled with sensible Federal-State relations or the constitutional separation of the powers of the Federal and State Governments. This is the provision which specifies, in essence, that the persons for whose benefit the Attorney General sues are excused from complying with State laws establishing administrative remedies for the supposed wrongs of which they complain.

This provision is designed to enable the Federal courts to exercise in the first instance powers clearly reserved to the States, and conflicts with the general rule that the Federal Government may not, in the exercise of its powers, prevent a State from discharging its ordinary functions of government. As a simple matter of evidence, it is difficult to understand how any Federal court can truthfully find that any person is being deprived of any rights by any State until such person pursues the administrative remedies created by such State to determine whether he possesses the rights he claims.

Be this as it may, this provision proposes, in effect, that Congress delegate to the Attorney General the power to suspend State laws prescribing administrative remedies. Congress cannot do this. The laws establishing administrative remedies are enacted by the States in the undoubted exercise of the power reserved to them by the 10th amendment and neither the Congress nor its delegates can nullify them.

Whenever a government subjects any of the rights or liabilities of any of its citizens to the mere will of a single public officer, law ends and tyranny begins, no matter how benevolent such officer may be.

CIVIL RIGHTS PROGRAM MISCONSTRUES SUPREME COURT DECISIONS

I shall mention one other matter. If the writer of Ecclesiastes had been alive when the most drastic of the pending civil rights bills—S. 810—was introduced, he could not have said that "there is nothing new under the sun."

This bill certainly contains something new under the legislative sun, i.e., a proposal that Congress place its specific blessing upon specific Supreme Court decisions, namely, the so-called school-desegregation decisions.

Is it possible that the proponents of this bill entertain some doubt as to the validity of these decisions, and believe that such doubt can be removed if Congress gives them legislative sanction?

Since the Constitution denies to Congress any power to interpret any laws, there is grave doubt as to the propriety of Congress undertaking to do so in respect to these or any other decisions. Be this as it may it is exceedingly unwise for Congress to undertake to do so because Congress is composed of politically minded men who frequently cannot distinguish between good politics and bad law.

The validity of this observation is sustained by S. 810 itself. After stamping the so-called school desegregation decisions with their emphatic blessing, the proponents of this bill proceed to place upon the decisions their own interpretation which goes many bow shots beyond the decisions and the Constitution.

One of the greatest jurists America has known, the late Chief Judge John J. Parker, of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, pointed out "exactly what the Supreme Court has decided and what it has not decided" in Briggs v. Elliott, 132 F. Supp. 776.

"It has not decided that the Federal courts are to take over or regulate the public schools of the States. It has not decided that the States must mix persons of different races in the schools or must require them to attend schools or must deprive them of the right of choosing the schools they attend. What it has decided, and all that it has decided, is that a State may not deny to any person on account of race the right to attend any school that it maintains. This, under the decision of the Supreme Court, the State may not do directly or indirectly; but if the schools which it maintains are open to children of all races, no violation of the Constitution is involved even though the children of different races voluntarily attend different schools, as they attend different churches. Nothing in the Constitution or in the decision of the Supreme Court takes away from the people freedom to choose the schools they attend. The Constitution, in other words, does not require integration. It merely forbids discrimination. It does not forbid such segregation as occurs as the result of voluntary action. It merely forbids the use of governmental power to enforce segregation. The 14th amendment is a limitation upon the exercise of power by the State or State agencies, not a limitation upon the freedom of individuals."

The proponents of S. 810 ignore the actual holding of the Supreme Court in these cases and propose that Congress give the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare authority to send his agents into all the school districts of the Southern States "to expedite the elimination of segregation" in the schools in such districts, regardless of the wishes of the parents of the children of both races residing in such districts.

THE ISSUE: SHALL AMERICA'S BIRTHRIGHT BE SOLD FOR POTTAGE?

A great issue is pending in the United States. When all is said, it is this: Shall the bar and the people of America permit the advocates of the civil rights program to sell America's constitutional birthright for a mess of pottage?

In deciding this issue let the bar and the people weigh these words of Daniel Webster:

"Other misfortunes may be borne or their effects overcome. If disastrous wars should sweep our commerce from the ocean, another generation may renew it; if it exhaust our treasury, future industry may replenish it; if it desolate and lay waste our fields, still, under a new cultivation, they will grow green again, and ripen to future harvests.

"It were but a trifle even if the walls of yonder capitol were to crumble, if its lofty pillars should fall, and its gorgeous decorations be all covered by the dust of the valley. All these may be rebuilt.

"But who shall reconstruct the fabric of demolished government?

"Who shall rear again the well proportioned columns of constitutional liberty?

"Who shall frame together the skillful architecture which unites national sovereignty with State rights, individual security, and public prosperity?

"No; if these columns fall they will be raised not again. Like the Colosseum and the Parthenon, they will be destined to a mournful and melancholy immortality. Bitterer tears, however, will flow over them than ever were shed over the monuments of Roman or Grecian art; for they will be monuments of a more glorious edifice than Greece or Rome ever saw—the edifice of constitutional American liberty."

DEATH OF FORMER SENATOR NORRIS BROWN, OF NEBRASKA

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, on the eve of this 2d session of the 86th Congress, one of our former colleagues passed away. I speak of Senator Norris Brown, who served in this body as a Senator from Nebraska from 1907 to 1913. He was the last survivor of those elected to the 60th Congress.

Senator Brown was born in Maquoketa, Iowa, on May 2, 1863. He was admitted to the Iowa bar in 1884. Moving to Kearney, Nebr., 4 years later, he continued to practice law and engage in civic activities. He served as county attorney for Buffalo County, Nebr., from 1892 to 1896 and as the State's deputy attorney general and attorney general from 1900 until his election to the Senate. Following his term in Washington, Senator Brown reentered the private practice of law and was recognized as a leader in the Omaha bar until his retirement in 1943. It was my good fortune to have engaged in matters of general law nature with him and his law firm in my years of active practice.

The Senator from Nebraska marks with sorrow the death of this distinguished American. His life was dedicated to service of his country and State. Both were honored and enriched by his character and career. We shall miss his person and now mourn his passing. Our heartfelt sympathy is extended to the two daughters who survive him, Mrs. R. H. Bailey and Mrs. Frank A. Jones.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD two news accounts about former Senator Brown's public career and reporting his decease.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INCOME TAX'S SPONSOR DIES

The father of the Constitution's 16th amendment, which legalized the Federal income tax, died yesterday in a Seattle, Wash., rest home at the age of 96.

He was Norris Brown, who sponsored the revolutionary fiscal innovation during the one term (1907–13) he served in the Senate as a Nebraskan Republican.

He was the last surviving Member of the 60th Congress, which included such memorable political stalwarts as Nevada's Key Pittman, Henry Cabot Lodge, Sr., and Herbert Hoover's Vice President, Charles Curtis. Senator Brown himself was succeeded by Nebraska's "Mr. Republican," the late George W. Norris.

Senator Brown introduced his income tax resolution in 1909 and saw it become the law of the land a month before he left office in 1913, by which time the required number of States had ratified it.

He also lived to see the amendment affect profoundly the life of nearly every one of his adult fellow citizens. There were few enough, however, to feel its financial pinch at the time of the amendment's adoption. The whole national budget for that year was a mere $724 million and the tax rate was only 1 percent on incomes in excess of $20,000.

Mr. Brown was born in Maquoketa, Iowa, the son of Mr. and Mrs. William H. Brown. He took his law degree from Iowa State University. Until his death he was the only living member of the school's class of 1883.

He served as county attorney for Buffalo County, Nebr., 4 years and as the State's deputy attorney general and attorney general from 1900 until his election to the Senate.

His retirement from politics was followed by 30 more years in the private practice of the law, during which time he served as counsel for Omaha's stockyards. He had made his home in Seattle since 1943.

"The President and Congress are responsible for the present welfare and safety of the Americas," he told an interviewer only 4 years ago. "My prayer is that they will continue to protect the freedoms our people have enjoyed for so many generations. I think they will."

The former Senator is survived by two daughters, Mrs. R. H. Bailey and Mrs. Frank A. Jones, both of Seattle.

[From the New York Times, Jan. 6, 1960]

NORRIS BROWN, 96, EX-U.S. SENATOR—NEBRASKAN WHO INTRODUCED RESOLUTION FOR INCOME TAX AMENDMENT IS DEAD

SEATTLE, January 5.—Norris Brown, former U.S. Senator who wrote the resolution that led to the 16th amendment, which legalized the Federal income tax died at a rest home here today. He was 96 years old.

Mr. Brown, a Republican, represented Nebraska in the Senate from 1907 to 1913 and was the last remaining Member of the 60th Congress. He introduced the resolution in 1909 that sent the income tax amendment to the States for ratification. It became law in February 1913, 1 month before Mr. Brown left office.

Few Americans were affected then. The entire national budget in that year was only $724 million, and the tax rate was 1 percent on incomes in excess of $3,000 for single persons and $4,000 for married persons.

Mr. Brown was Nebraska State attorney general from 1904 to 1906 and gained fame by winning a tax suit of more than $1 million against the railroads. The money was used to open schools.

After leaving the Senate, Mr. Brown was counsel for the Omaha stockyards for 30 years. He had made his home here since 1943.

Mr. Brown was born in Maquoketa, Iowa, and was the last surviving member of the class of 1883 at the University of Iowa.

Survivors include two daughters, Mrs. R. H. Bailey and Mrs. Frank A. Jones, both of Seattle; two grandchildren; and three great-grandchildren.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will my colleague yield to me?

Mr. HRUSKA. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. For the RECORD I wish to add a few words in tribute to the life of Norris Brown. He was a distinguished lawyer and a great legislator. He lived a long time and served the public for many years. His memory is cherished, and I join in extending sympathy and condolences to his two daughters.

NEED FOR ADDITIONAL FEDERAL JUDGES IN SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, during the adjournment of Congress I conferred with judges of the Federal courts of the southern district of New York, with regard to the need for additional Federal judges in the southern district of New York.

NEED FOR FEDERAL JUDGES BILL

A grave national problem which has been of continuing concern to me, and I know to all of us in the Senate, is the continually growing congestion of Federal court calendars; this is especially a critical problem in the southern and eastern district courts in New York. The omnibus judgeship bill now on the Senate Calendar is a clear recognition of the need for additional judgeships to deal with the legal problems of our growing population and the growing complexity of our society. It is in the highest public interest that this bill be called up for early action, so that there will be an opportunity to consider what additional judgeships should be added to the bill to constitute the minimum necessary for the proper operation of the courts.

My own deep concern led me to meet with the Chief Judge Sylvester J. Ryan and the other judges of the southern district of New York at the end of November, and to hear from them at first hand the problems and needs of the busiest district court in the country. As a result of these conversations I became more convinced than ever of the need for added judgeships beyond those now proposed, and requested the judges to let me have an analysis of their current caseloads, particularly with respect to the long and protracted cases which can tie up a judge for weeks and months at a time. Because of its location at the business and maritime center of the Nation, the southern district has a particularly heavy load of such cases. Just as an example, the southern district has 40 percent of all the admiralty suits pending in the entire country, and about 20 percent of all civil cases in the Federal courts.

Of particular interest to me was the fact that the southern district may well be the forum for many of the cases expected under the Labor-Management Reporting Act of 1959, an entirely new area of litigation which was not considered in previous recommendations for increased judgeships.

I therefore ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD at this point a number of memorandums on these matters submitted to me by Chief Judge Ryan at my request.

There being no objection, the memorandums were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. DISTRICT COURT,
New York, N.Y., December 9, 1959.

Hon. JACOB K. JAVITS,
U.S. Senator, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR JAVITS: I refer to the inquiry of your letter of December 2, 1959, and to my promise to send you additional information on the following subjects:

1. The long and protracted suits pending in the southern district of New York.

The latest available analysis of the type of civil litigation pending in the court is as of date of July 1, 1959. It showed a total of 10,937 pending civil suits (which increased by November 30, 1959, to 11,482 pending civil suits). Included in this number were:

Private antitrust suits	129
Government antitrust suits	33
Patent suits	237
Copyright suits	161
Total suits other than in admiralty	560
Admiralty suits	2,376

The antitrust suits (Government and private) totaled 162, all of which are classic long and protracted suits. Experience shows that at least 20 percent of the patent and copyright suits—here, about 79 of the pending suits of this nature also fall within the grouping of long and protracted suits; as do about 3 percent of the admiralty suits, or 71 suits. This makes a total of:

Antitrust suits	162
Patent and copyright suits	79
Admiralty suits	71
Total pending long and protracted suits on July 1, 1959	312

Enclosed is a memorandum on the Govment antitrust suits.

We may anticipate that at least 150 of the 7,100 civil suits to be filed during the current fiscal year will be long and protracted suits. Enclosed are the figures on the filings for the past 5 months, and comparison with last year. Analysis of these current filings show that private (other than Government) suits are increasing; that personal injury suits filings are up 50 percent over last year; that U.S. and admiralty suit filings are down 20 percent.

Of course, I do not want to bog you with statistics; a chief judge should know how the court is functioning without too many reports and figures. All the judges are loaded down with work; more litigation keeps coming in and I do not have enough judges to keep abreast of the tide. I enclose a most recent report.

2. The additional litigation to be expected from the recent amendments to the Labor-Management Act.

Since 1947, the court has had a number of suits filed by the NLRB for injunctive relief pending investigation by it of unfair labor practice charges; the new legislation provides for both civil and criminal jurisdiction in the district courts arising from denial of "rights" to union members and from the financial and other reports now required to be filed.

It is impossible at this time to measure either the number of suits or prosecutions anticipated to be filed or the judicial time which these matters will require. The protection of "rights" of union members will fall within the scope of the work of the NLRB (although there is also provision for private suits); the enforcement of the provisions requiring financial reports will be the duty of the Department of Labor. A recent statement of Secretary of Labor Mitchell indicates that he is setting up a special bureau "to handle the Labor Department's responsibility in the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959"; and that "the bureau will receive and analyze about 60,000 reports a year" and will "see that the law's reporting requirements are obeyed." I expect that a substantial portion of these enforcement proceedings will be filed in this court.

I have requested both agencies to endeavor to give me their thoughts on the probable caseload and await word from them. When I receive this information, I shall advise you and Senator KEATING.

With my best regards, I am,
Sincerely,

SYLVESTER J. RYAN,
Chief Judge.

CRIMINAL CASES

Title and case No.	Date filed	Judge assigned if any	Status	Comment
U.S. v. American Smelting and Refining Company, et al., Cr. 159–150.	June 19, 1959			This is a price-fixing case in the field of type metals. 1 defendant has pleaded nolo and the remaining defendant has filed motion to dismiss on the ground that its criminal prosecution was improper because it had earlier entered into a consent decree with the Government. If the remaining defendant loses this motion, it is expected then to plead nolo.
U.S. v. J. M. Huber and Western Newspaper Union, Cr. 159–149.	do			This is a price-fixing case in the field of printers' ink. 1 defendant has pleaded nolo and the remaining defendant has filed a motion to dismiss on the same ground as in American Smelting above. Again the remaining defendant is expected to plead nolo if it loses its motion to dismiss.

CIVIL CASES

U.S. v. American Smelting and Refining Co., et al., Civ. 88–249.	Oct. 9, 1953	David N. Edelstein	Sub judice	The 2 largest lead producers in the United States were charged with restraining, attempting to monopolize and monopolizing interstate and foreign trade and commerce in production and sale of primary lead. Annual sales involved approximately $55,000,000.
U.S. v. Pan American World Airways, Inc., et al., Civ. 90–259.	Jan. 11, 1954	Thomas F. Murphy	do	The case attacks the common ownership of an airline by a competing airline and a steamship company and charges allocation and monopolization of South American markets. The case is of substantial importance because it affects freight and passenger commerce between the United States and South America, the value of which is estimated at more than $100,000,000 annually.
U.S. v. Continental Can Co., Inc., et al., Civ. 112–387.	Sept. 10, 1956	Frederick V. P. Bryan		Merger case charging Continental Can and Hazel-Atlas Glass Co. with violation of Clayton Act, sec. 7. Continental Can, with total sales of approximately $666,000,000, seeks to acquire assets of Hazel-Atlas, largest manufacturer of widemouth glass bottles and second largest manufacturer of glass containers, with total sales of $80,000,000. It is estimated that trial will take 1 month.
U.S. v. Continental Can Co., Inc., Civ. 114–177.	Oct. 30, 1956	do		A merger case charging Continental Can with acquiring Robert Gair Co. in violation of sec. 7 of the Clayton Act. Continental Can has annual sales of $666,000,000. Robert Gair Co., a major company manufacturing paperboard paper containers and paper packaging products, has annual sales of $134,000,000. It is estimated that trial will take 1 month.
U.S. v. Loew's Incorporated, Civ. 119–24.	Mar. 27, 1957	Archie O. Dawson	Consolidated	The central issue in these cases is whether the defendants have licensed certain feature films to television stations on the condition that the station will also take one or more other less desirable films. It is estimated that films worth more than $100,000,000 are involved. The theory of the cases is that television stations have been required to buy unwanted films and thus are showing these less desirable films to the detriment of the viewing public. It is estimated that the trial will take 2 months.
U.S. v. C & C Super Corp., Civ. 119–284.	Apr. 18, 1957	do
U.S. v. Screen Gems, Inc., Civ. 119–285.	do	do
U.S. v. Associated Artists Productions, Inc., Civ. 119–286.	do	do
U.S. v. National Telefilm Associates, Inc., Civ. 119–287.	do	do
U.S. v. United Artists Corporation, Civ. 119–288.	do	do
U.S. v. Columbia Pictures Corp., et al., Civ. 132–86.	Apr. 10, 1958	William B. Herlands		Involves Sherman Act, sec. 1, and Clayton Act, sec. 7, violations. Charges Screen Gems, Columbia Pictures, and Universal Pictures with price fixing and asset acquisition of 600 pre-1948 feature films for TV exhibition. It is estimated that this trial will take 3 or 4 weeks, excluding formal pretrial hearings.
U.S. v. Lever Brothers Company, et al., Civ. 135–219.	July 8, 1958			This case charges a violation of sec. 7 of the Clayton Act growing out of Lever's acquisition of assets relating to "All" from Monsanto Chemical Co. Lever is one of the Nation's largest producers of detergent products used in the home, having total annual sales of all products of $344,000,000. Monsanto, one of largest chemical companies in the United States, has annual sales of detergent products in the amount of $29,000,000. It is expected that the trial will take 6 weeks.
U. S. v Standard Oil Company (New Jersey), Civ. 86–27.	Apr. 21, 1953	John M. Cashin		This case involves the foreign operations of major international oil companies during the past 25 years. It charges monopolization of U.S. imports and exports and foreign production, refining, transportation, and marketing. The case is of unusual complexity and importance because it touches upon the national security and foreign policy of the United States. It is anticipated that the trial will take 6 months.
U.S. v. The Hertz Corporation, Civ. 145–364.	May 1, 1959			Clayton sec. 7 charges Hertz, largest motor vehicle renting and licensing company, with acquiring during past 5 years stock and assets of numerous companies engaged in same business. Operating in various geographical areas of United States. Suit seeks to force Hertz to divest itself of the many acquisitions. It is estimated that the trial will take 6 to 8 weeks.
U.S. v. Kennecott Copper Corporation, Civ. 147–231.	June 22, 1959			Charges Kennecott with acquisition of assets of Okonite Co. with Clayton sec. 7 violation. Suit involves highly concentrated copper industry resulting largely from mergers and acquisitions by all leading copper-producing companies. Charges a lessening of competition in the production and sale of copper and copper-content products, and copper wire and cable. It is estimated that the trial will take 6 to 8 weeks.
United States v. United Artists, Civ. 150–267.	Sept. 15, 1959	David N. Edelstein		Defendant charged with acquiring approximately 750 RKO feature films from Associated Artists and approximately 750 Warner Bros. feature films from C. & C. Co. for use in television exhibition, in violation of sec. 7 of the Clayton Act. Estimated that Government's case will take approximately 2 weeks.
United States v. General Motors, Civ. 151–370.	Oct. 16, 1959		Motion for change of venue pending.	This case charges General Motors with acquiring Euclid Road Machinery Co. in violation of sec. 7 of the Clayton Act. Euclid, prior to acquisition, was the largest producer in the United States of off-highway dump trucks and a substantial factor in the manufacture and sale of other types of off-highway earth moving equipment. Off-highway earth moving equipment is used principally in connection with the Nation's highway building program, the construction of dams, airports, levees, the mining industry and other fields where hauling and other types of heavy equipment are needed to move large quantities of materials, such as earth, rock, ore, and coal. It is a billion-dollar industry. It is expected that trial will take 2 to 3 months.

U.S. DISTRICT COURT,
New York, N.Y., December 29, 1959.

Hon. JACOB K. JAVITS,
U.S. Senator,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR JAVITS: Many thanks to you for your kind letter of December 22.

Yesterday, Senator KEATING paid us a visit. I enclose herewith a copy of a letter the judges of the court have this day sent to Mr. Melvin Purvis. I thought it might be of interest to you.

If at any time you desire any further facts concerning the problems of the court, I will be very happy to give them to you.

With my warm personal regards, I am,
Sincerely,

SYLVESTER J. RYAN.

U.S. DISTRICT COURT,
New York, N.Y., December 21, 1959.

MELVIN H. PURVIS, Esq.,
Chief Counsel, Subcommittee on Improvements in Judicial Machinery, Committee on the Judiciary, Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PURVIS: The judges of the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York acknowledge with thanks your identical letters addressed to each of them under date of December 8, 1959. We write this joint response for your convenience for we are united on our appraisal of the urgent needs of this the largest of all the Federal district courts. We are prompted also to write this one letter because action taken on important judicial administrative affairs follows the decision of the judges reached after conference at which all views are fully expressed, carefully considered, and frankly discussed.

We are encouraged by the interest in the court by the Senate Committee on the Judiciary and you as chief counsel of the committee. During the past several weeks we have had visits to the court from Senator JAVITS and Congressmen CELLER and ROONEY; we expect Senator KEATING to come within the next 2 weeks. We extend to Senator JOHNSTON, to the members of the committee, and to you a cordial invitation to sit down with us and permit us to tell our situation in an informal talk. We are of the opinion that much can be gained from this manner of approach to our problems.

The root of our congested calendars lies not alone in the enormous volume of civil suits filed but in the type of litigation in this district and our shortage of judicial manpower. With New York City (principally the county of New York, within the southern district) the hub of our national financial, business, economic and shipping activities, we must expect that the major portion of the litigation involving large sums of money and basic legal principles will be filed here. The same observation may be made of the reorganization of great business enterprises, which find themselves in difficult financial situations or in derivative stockholders suits; likewise of Government and private antitrust suits and of patent and copyright litigation. We have endeavored to point out this qualitative situation in our last annual report, copies of which we sent you following the meeting of the Judicial Conference last September.

We know that in the fiscal year 1958–59, a total of 6,549 civil suits were filed. It may be anticipated, judged from current filings for the first 5 months of this year, that there will be an increased filing of more than 600 suits, bringing the expected total for the current year to a minimum of 7,100 civil suits commenced. We started this fiscal year with 10,920 civil suits pending.

It is simple fact that during this current year a total of at least 18,000 civil suits will have to be processed by a court with 18 active judges; a caseload of at least 1,000 per judge. But there are not 18 judges available for this work; at least 4 judges are required for criminal parts and many of the criminal trials run from 1 to 3 months; more than 50 percent of the time of the chief judge is taken up with administrative matters; and, generally, unfortunately, there is at least 1 judge ill. The actual number of judges available then to process these 18,000 civil suits during the current year will be 12½.

Of the 10,920 suits pending on June 30, 1959, we find that 237 were patent suits, and 129 were suits filed under the antitrust laws. These are classic, long, and complicated suits. In addition, 736 were diversity suits filed on claims of breach of contract, and at least 25 of these are long and protracted suits. While there is no breakdown of Robinson-Patman Act suits, it is safe to say that about 3 percent of the 891 suits filed involving other than specific Federal questions, are Robinson-Patman Act suits, which are long and complicated suits. A most conservative estimate is that on June 30, 1959, at least 300 of the pending 10,920 suits are long and complicated suits, each of which should have been assigned to a single judge shortly after filing. At this time about 80 civil suits of this nature should be assigned, but this cannot be done because of a shortage of judges.

We may expect that from 2 to 3 percent of the current year filings of the total of 7,000 suits—or at least 150 will be long and complicated suits which should be assigned to a single judge at an early date. This means that during this fiscal year the court will have to process some 450 long and complicated suits out of the total caseload of 18,000. The burden is intolerable and cannot be properly handled with our present number of judges.

When we appraise the situation in terms of the judicial manpower required by the volume and type of litigation in this district the minimum requirement is 24 judges—or 6 more than we presently have.

We know that the volume and the protracted type of litigation will continue to grow and increase; and as our calendars become more and more current, we may expect this increase to be even larger. A court with calendars which are current attracts litigation which might be filed otherwise in another forum where trial will be delayed.

With sufficient judicial manpower, we are confident we can solve all problems of administration.

Respectfully yours,

THERE IS URGENT NEED FOR SIX ADDITIONAL JUDGES IN THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK

The Judicial Conference recommended six additional judges for the southern district; the present proposed legislation provides for three additional judges for the district; the bill should be amended to provide for six, the number set by the conference.

I feel that this situation has not been fully considered and properly appraised.

Although legislation has since 1955 authorized 18 judges for the district, at no time since 1955 have we had our full quota, save since late September 1959. The actual number of judges serving in the district since 1955 has been:

Fiscal year:
1956	[1] 16¾
1957	17¾
1958	17½
1959	16¾

[1] Fractions indicate the portion of year judge has held office.

Presently, we have the following senior judges in the district:

Judge Knox—substantial part-time service, handles most of our condemnation suits and some admiralty suits.

Judge Conger—almost full time, tries civil jury suits, and assists substantially in pretrial and review calendars.

Judge Clancy—full time on nonjury suits.

Judge Bondy—has been unable to sit for more than a year, 90 years old.

Judge Leibell—until June 1959 rendered substantial service on all types of suits save admiralty, now because of health can assist only occasionally on nonjury suits.

Judge S. H. Kaufman—retired on disability, unable to sit for past 6 years.

While these senior judges do give great assistance to the court, their contribution is not of a steady or constant character such as will permit of their regular assignment to any particular trial part or calendar.

We have had some help, too, from visiting judges; during the October 1959 term, Senior Judge Reeves and Judges Boldt and Foley sat with us; during the November 1959 term, we had Senior Judge Reeves and, for a 3-week period, Judge Lynne. All of these judges were assigned to criminal trials and gave help on that calendar. Long and protracted suits cannot be assigned to a visiting judge and experience has shown that ordinarily the assignment of any nonjury suit to a visiting judge is not advisable.

The present criminal calendar requires a regular assignment of four judges on a full-time trial basis. Although the annual number of criminal prosecutions runs to a relatively small number—approximately 1,000 to 1,200—we have an unusually large number of long trials (principally income tax prosecutions, so-called racket prosecutions). We also find that the mandatory sentences in narcotic cases result in many trials where ordinarily guilty pleas might be expected.

The root of our congested calendars lies not alone in the enormous volume of civil suits filed but in the type of litigation in this district and our shortage of judicial manpower. With New York City (principally the county of New York, within the southern district) the hub of our national financial, business, economic, and shipping activities, we must expect that the major portion of the litigation involving large sums of money and basic legal principles will be filed here. The same observation may be made of the reorganization of great business enterprises, which find themselves in difficult financial situations or in derivative stockholders suits; likewise of Government and private antitrust suits and of patent and copyright litigation. We have endeavored to point out this qualitative situation in our last annual report. However, let us for a moment consider only the volume of litigation in this district.

The fundamental statistical justification for additional judgeships has been basically unrealistic. We have sought to support our requests upon the number of civil cases pending per judgeship.

While this is overwhelming, and on June 30, 1959, was 608 civil suits per judgeship, the actual measure should be the annual number of suits required to be processed, supervised, or handled per judgeship.

To illustrate this, let us examine the record, and we find:

We also know that in the fiscal year 1958–59, a total of 6,549 civil suits were filed. It may be anticipated, judged from current filings for the first 4 months of this year, that there will be an increased filing of more than 600 suits, bringing the expected total for the current year to a minimum of 7,100 civil suits commenced. We started this fiscal year with 10,920 civil suits pending.

It is simple fact that during this current year a total of at least 18,000 civil suits will have to be processed by a court with 18 active judges; a caseload of at least 1,000 per judge. But there are not 18 judges available for this work; at least 4 judges are required for criminal parts; more than 50 percent of the time of the chief judge is taken up with administrative matters; and, generally, unfortunately, there is at least 1 judge ill. The actual number of judges available then to process these 18,000 civil suits during the current year will be 12½.

Of the 10,920 suits pending on June 30, 1959, we find that 237 were patent suits, and 129 were suits filed under the antitrust laws. These are classic long and complicated suits. In addition, 736 were diversity suits filed on claims of breach of contract, and at least 25 of these are long and protracted suits. While there is no breakdown of Robinson-Patman Act suits, it is safe to say that about 3 percent of the 891 suits filed involving other than specific Federal questions, are Robinson-Patman Act sutis, which are long and complicated suits. A most conservative estimate is that on June 30, 1959, at least 300 of the pending 10,920 suits are long and complicated suits, each of which should have been assigned to a single judge shortly after filing. At this time about 80 civil suits of this nature are so individually assigned and more than 200 suits of this nature should be assigned, but this cannot be done because of a shortage of judges.

In addition, we may expect that from 2 to 3 percent of the current year filings of the total of 7,000 suits—or at least 150 will be long and complicated suits which should be assigned to a single judge at an early date. This means that during this fiscal year the court will have to process some 450 long and complicated suits out of the total caseload of 18,000. The burden is intolerable and cannot be properly handled with our present number of judges.

It is estimated that one suit (civil 105–146) will take 8 months to try. One private antitrust suit seeks damage of $14,382,996 (civil 85–239); another of $87,690,000 (civil 85–258); another of $792,361 (civil 69–217); another of $6,075,000 (civil 144–280); another of $8,125,137 (civil 87–361); and these are only a few of the many. The fields of industries involved in the suits range from bottled baby foods and bananas to copyright music, watches, radio tubes, computers, television broadcasting, color photography, prizefight promotion, and smelting of lead and copper cables.

The admiralty suits numbering 2,376 (which is exclusive of Jones Act and personal injury suits) is 40 percent of the admiralty suits pending in the Federal courts of the Nation. Here, we have most of the major maritime disasters, and these suits involve hull damage, cargo damage, and charter parties (besides personal injury and death claims).

Some criticism has been made of the failure to use pretrial procedures to the fullest extent possible. The judges of the court recognize the benefits of pretrial; it is applied constantly and to the fullest extent possible with our limited manpower.

It is estimated that one suit (civil 105–146) pretry the average lawsuit one judge would be limited in output to a monthly product of not more than 125 pretrials. Indeed, many complicated suits require 1 or more days to pre-try. Taking 125 pretrials as an average monthly output for a judge, with about 600 filings per month, it would take 5 judges just to keep abreast of the current filings. This does not take care of the pretrials required in the pending 11,000 civil suits.

Of course, we should have more intensive use of pretrial procedure but it simply cannot be done with our present organization both on the bench and in the clerk's office.

The need for more judges and larger clerical force is urgent and serious.

When we appraise the situation in terms of the judicial manpower required by the volume and type of litigation, we find that the minimum judicial requirement is 24 judges. The further observation must be made that no special provision has been made for the handling of the long and protracted civil suits; either for pretrial supervision or actual trial. It is hoped that these suits can be worked on and tried by the judges while they are assigned to trial parts. It must be noted, too, that the four judges assigned to pretrials will be kept busy on the current annual 7,100 civil-suit inflow; we anticipate that with the constant trials and incident trial pretrials, the court will be able to bring the discovery pretrials up to current filings within 2 years. The senior judges and the visiting judges will fill in for the regularly assigned judges when ill or when unable to accept their regular assignment because of a long trial or an accumulation of work which requires research, reading, and writing in chambers. Thus, they will function as an emergency corps to relieve and to participate in the disposition of suits on a particular calendar which may be falling behind.

We know that the volume and the protracted type of litigation will continue to grow and increase; and as our calendars become more and more current, we may expect this increase to be even larger. A court with calendars which are current attracts litigation which might be filed otherwise in another forum where trial will be delayed. Experience also teaches that in every period of economic adjustment of recession, private settlements without litigation become fewer, settlement of suits in court slow down, reorganization of business enterprises increase in number, and there are more criminal prosecutions. The greatest impact is felt in the metropolitan districts and particularly in the southern district of New York.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will my distinguished colleague yield to me?

Mr. JAVITS. I am happy to yield.

Mr. KEATING. During the adjournment of Congress I also conferred with the judges of the Federal court in the southern district of New York, and I strongly agree with everything my distinguished colleague has said. The situation in the southern district of New York is probably unique in the entire country, from the standpoint of the type of cases which come before the court.

I talked with several judges who stated that they had cases before them, or were about to have cases before them, which would require months, running in some instances into years, of the time of one judge. They included extremely complicated patent cases, antitrust cases, and others.

There is thus a real and pressing need for additional judges in the southern district of New York. I feel that the so-called omnibus judgeship bill, which may provide three or four additional judges for that district, which is probably all that can be realistically expected, will, after its passage, still be inadequate to cope with the situation there.

The length of time between the bringing of a case and the disposition of it has been increasing over the years. That burden falls most heavily upon those who can ill afford it. Indigent litigants or litigants of modest means are often forced to settle litigation because they cannot wait 3 or 4 years to have it determined.

I sincerely and earnestly hope that in this session of the Congress we shall come to grips with this problem. I compliment my colleague from New York for bringing it to our attention at this time.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I thank my colleague for his eloquent support, and I am delighted to join with him in this effort.

THE INADEQUACIES OF THE PRESENT AGRICULTURAL PROGRAM

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, Democrats in Douglas County, Oreg., are as are all American farmers seriously concerned over the inadequacies of our present agricultural program.

In a recent convention, they urged that the present program be replaced by one which will benefit all farmers. Because of my work with the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, I was especially pleased to note that an underlying consideration of the policies advocated by this fine public-spirited group is that our surplus food production be used to advance the cause of world peace and to feed hungry people throughout the world. I certainly share their belief that food instead of armaments will enable our country to maintain leadership in the world and foster good will everywhere.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Douglas County Democratic convention farm program which was printed in the January 1, 1960, issue of the Douglas Fir, a news publication of interest to the lumber industry as well as the farm community, be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the program was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FARM PROGRAM

We urge the enactment of a farm program that will benefit every tiller of the soil, to the end that all farm families shall earn a living wage and maintain a decent standard of living. It is necessary that the Eisenhower-Benson farm program be junked, discrimination against the small farmer and in favor of the major basic crops be eliminated, and that a realistic price support program be enacted. With millions of starving people throughout the world and an increase of millions of mouths to feed during this population explosion, we have no need to fear farm surplus in the future.

Our so-called farm surplus must be used to advance the cause of world peace and to feed hungry people throughout the world. We believe that food instead of armaments will enable this great Nation to maintain leadership among all countries and foster good will everywhere.

WHAT CAN WE PAY FOR PLENTY?

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, Mr. Harley Libby, past president of the Oregon Farmers Union, in an article entitled "What Can We Pay for Plenty?" published in the October 15 issue of the Oregon Farmer, has posed some very interesting questions deserving careful attention by the Congress.

When he states "people are important; they should come neither last nor least; they create the problems and the necessity for answers; any solution that allows human values to become submerged in economic issues has missed its basic purpose" he has struck a note that should echo throughout all legislative work to which we commit ourselves in this and every session of the Congress.

Mr. President, because I feel that the article contains much food for thought, I commend it to my colleagues and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHAT CAN WE PAY FOR PLENTY?

(By Harley Libby)

So much has been said about our farm problems and about subsidies and surpluses that one hesitates to make any addition. But operating on the assumption that TV commercials can't all be wrong and that constant repetition does bear fruit, I offer the following with the hope that it may stimulate some serious thinking.

THE COST OF OUR ABUNDANCE

True, the problems of plenty are real and must be dealt with realistically.

We would do well to decide, first of all, that life is much more kind to people in a land of plenty. To know freedom from hunger and cold should be counted as a blessing and not a cross to bear.

No sound-thinking person believes that we can ever achieve an exactly balanced program of production-to-need. Then isn't it better that the balance be on the side of abundance and that we do have a reasonable food bank to insure against hunger?

And should we not apply business thinking and write off the cost of that insured security as we might car, life or fire insurance?

But surpluses beyond reason do present a real challenge. What have we done about them? Not enough, surely.

The National Farmers Union has long advocated a unit measure of bushels—tons—etc., rather than heavily fertilized acres as the proper measure for production quotas, and a broadening of the basics. It has also asked for a definite dollar and cent limitation on price supports to any one producer. The purpose for both:

(1) to discourage over-production; (2) to stop channeling so much acreage into the few protected crops; (3) to prevent undue individual benefits.

To date Congress, the U.S. Department of Agriculture, and the national administration have all failed to take a firm stand.

Senator NEUBERGER's proposed food for peace plan, calling for the use of surpluses to feed the hungry peoples of the world certainly has merit. (Incidentally, I was pleased to note the Oregon Farmer's support for this suggestion.) To date we have seemingly preferred to send money and munitions, writing the cost off to national security. Would not food to the hungry create equal good will—and much less suspicion? And wouldn't that be a living demonstration of international humanitarianism and also a contribution to national security?

Likewise, the Oregon Wheat League is to be commended for its excellent work in the field of expanding uses of surplus commodities.

FOOD STAMP FUTURE

The food stamp plan, embodied in a bill by Senator WAYNE MORSE, could also well meet a domestic need and present both a saving and an outlet. With our abundance of food, why have we hesitated so long? Surely we would not seriously disrupt our trade economy by supplying food we cannot sell to those who have no money to buy.

The school lunch program has been an excellent example, not only of food distribution to the right people, but of food promotion. Teachers and those who do the actual contact work in the schools can tell of the increased taste for milk and vegetables so necessary to young growing bodies. (Just think what the brewing industry would give for such an opportunity.)

These programs should become more universal. They will certainly show long-range dividends in national health.

THE SOIL BANK IDEA

The soil bank idea, based on the theory that it is better to store fertility against future needs than to store excess surpluses makes sense. As enacted into law, it has been badly abused but the necessary teeth have now been added.

Many people find it difficult to reconcile the soil bank program with the activities of the reclamation service in bringing in new acres, or with the USDA's regular requests for more money for research for increased yields—to realize the hope of 100-bushels-per-acre wheat, for example. Or with the USDA's advice to further mechanize and to apply expensive fertilizers in greater abundance.

The advice is theirs and I leave the answer to them.

EIGHTY-PERCENT PROSPERITY

Most discussions and articles on the farm problem, particularly if they come from departments which live by legislative appropriations, avoid the matter of what farmers actually receive for their production.

The critics are often more inclined to describe glowingly the growth of vertical integration and the glories of expanded farm operations. In their enthusiasm they temporarily forget what is happening to the countless thousands of farm families without farms that most surely go hand in hand with the growth of vertical integration, contract farming and the decrease of market opportunities.

When the ills of the shrinking farm dollars are discussed they are often cheerfully blamed onto the fickle fancies of the consumer whose changing demands increase cost.

No one denies the changes, but let us look at this last one carefully and put part of the blame where it properly belongs.

The manufacturers, processors, and distributors who do fancy packaging and costly duplication in a competitive struggle to capture more and more of the profit in the consumer's dollar must also share responsibility.

It was not consumers who demanded five name brand bread deliveries at the corner grocery—and of loaves costing 30 cents plus and containing some 3 cents worth of wheat each, for example.

Nor was it you and I who asked for atomic age fishfin fenders and double-jointed tail lights that sent the cost of cars, repairs, and insurance to new heights.

It is well past the time that economists and farm advisers, including our own U.S. Department of Agriculture, need to become farm price conscious. It is time we all join in better acquainting the consuming public with what part of the dollar the farmer actually receives for his commodity at the farm.

Those who would advise should know that there are many young farmers today who face near bankruptcy in a losing struggle. It takes more than efficiency to pay for expensive modern farm machinery at a 100 percent plus parity price with farm commodities sold on an 80 percent of parity market.

It is time to come down to earth and realize that any farmer, regardless of size or volume or efficiency, who produces and markets a commodity at less than the cost of production has about as much chance as a woodpecker above timberline to share in the national prosperity.

It is a small and doubtful honor to be able to prove that by efficiency you were the farmer in your community who lost the least.

PEOPLE ARE IMPORTANT

Sometimes I wonder if in our zest to deal with statistics and in our eagerness to enthuse about bigness, we haven't forgotten the human factor that gives all others purpose—the people themselves.

Enough has been said in recent years to inform everyone that the farms of this Nation and the families that live on them are becoming fewer and fewer.

Always, and properly, there has been a constant and voluntary departure of members of farm families to enter other fields, to find employment.

Recently, however, that trend has become an exodus, and certainly not all voluntary. Nor are they all young, employable people. We are informed that about 75 percent of our young people today leave the land, and that about 50 percent of them are working today in organized labor.

Certainly we cannot hold this against them. They are our children. We have done our best to teach them the value of organization. We know that if labor today was as loosely organized as farmers, laborers too would be working for an 80 percent of parity paycheck.

Labor rallied well to meet the revolution of automation in industry by demanding—and receiving—better wages and shorter hours. We as farmers met the challenge of mechanization by producing more and more for less and less.

REWARD FOR EFFICIENCY

We seek no protective wall around inefficiency. Efficiency, good management, and industry are entitled to their just rewards. We know some people will prosper more than others in any vocation.

But many farmers would still remain upon the land, knowing that their economic returns would be a little lower than if they went to the city. They are following a chosen way of life and they would willingly exchange the opportunity to "eat a little higher on the hog" for the many fine intangible benefits of family life on the farm.

But this does not mean that these people should be crowded off into migrant labor status by an unfair economic setup. They are entitled to a fair price for their production. These family farm people are truly the salt of the earth. They believe in the land and what it can do. They live on, and from, the soil, in a partnership with God and nature. If democracy is ever put to the test for final existence, it is here in these country homes that its roots will be found most deeply imbedded and where it will live the longest.

LET'S SUM THIS UP

Freedom from hunger and cold is a blessing. We had best recognize it as such and write off its costs as we would any other sound insurance program.

Excessive surpluses are a challenge but can be made manageable by a varied attack. Production must be controlled to reasonably meet the needs of the day. But production should be limited by intelligent controls—not by ruinous prices.

Any farm program that does not plan for an equitable price for commodities to the producer renders little economic service to American agriculture.

People are important. They should come neither last nor least. They create the problems and the necessity for answers. Any solution that allows human values to become submerged in economic issues has missed its basic purpose.

FARM INCOME DOWN

Net farm income nationally for the first three quarters of 1959 was down sharply from the similar period of 1958, according to the USDA's current farm income situation report. (And many weren't getting rich in 1958.)

Income for the first 9 months of 1959 was reported as approximately $11,500 million; this was $1,500 million under the 1958 period—a decline of 12 percent. However, it was still 4½ percent above the recession year of 1957.

This year's January-August total of cash receipts from livestock and products was 4 percent less than last year's. Although prices averaged higher for cattle, they were substantially lower for hogs, broilers, and eggs.

Total crop receipts in the first 8 months of 1959, however, were reported as about the same as 1958. Receipts from corn, oranges, and tobacco were up considerably, but they were offset by a sharp drop in receipts from sorghum, grain, and wheat.

TRIBUTE TO SENATOR FONG OF HAWAII

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, last fall the distinguished senior Senator from Hawaii [Mr. FONG], traveled extensively in the Far East. His was a unique journey. First, he paid for the trip himself. It was unique for another reason also. I believe it has now been generally conceded that in his travels he, as a notable American citizen, dedicated himself to improving amity and happy relations between the people of the United States and those of the countries of the Far East which he visited.

The labors of our distinguished Hawaiian colleague were the basis of a commendatory resolution adopted by the Republican State Central Committee of the State of Hawaii at its meeting on November 7, 1959, in Hilo. A copy of it was transmitted to the Vice President of the United States by Mr. Merson L. Skinner, of the State central committee.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the resolution be printed in the body of the RECORD.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from California yield?

Mr. KUCHEL. I am delighted to yield to the able junior Senator from New York.

Mr. KEATING. I was in the Far East during the time our colleague, the distinguished senior Senator from Hawaii [Mr. FONG] was there. I did not encounter him there, but I did, on all sides, hear what a great ambassador of good will he was for our country. The fact that HIRAM FONG is of Chinese ancestry and is now serving in the Senate of the United States obviously meant much to the peoples of the Far East, who sometimes may feel that our ties are closer to other countries than to them.

I feel certain that the trip by Senator HIRAM FONG to the Far East will yield rich dividends to our country. I am very happy that the able senior Senator from California has brought this resolution to our attention.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from the Empire State. What the junior Senator from New York has just stated is that the citizenship of this country, which is heterogeneous in character, is able to demonstrate to all mankind that we do believe in constitutional freedom and in equal treatment under law.

As the able Senator from New York has said, the Senator from Hawaii, by reason of his background, has been in a unique situation to advance the cause of freedom.

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield to me on that point?

Mr. KUCHEL. I am delighted to yield to the distinguished junior Senator from Alaska.

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, many of us, as is true of the distinguished senior Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL], and the very able former Governor of California, Hon. Earl Warren, who first appointed him to the Senate, and who is now the Chief Justice of the United States, and others who have long supported statehood for Hawaii, have come to the conclusion that it was more important for the United States to grant statehood to Hawaii than for Hawaii to receive statehood. I believe the United States is more the beneficiary of the act of admitting Hawaii as a State of the Union than is Hawaii itself.

Except for spiritual gain, embodied in the glorious acquisition of full first-class citizenship, the people of Hawaii have gained in no material way, have in no measure changed their economic status by statehood; but by admitting Hawaii to statehood the United States has demonstrated something that rings to the farthest corners of the earth. It was a peaceable shot heard 'round the world.

It was very heartening to us who supported Hawaii's statehood cause and followed what took place thereafter, to observe that, regardless of party, the five principal candidates who were successful in the Hawaiian election represented five totally diverse ethnic strains.

Governor Quinn is of American-Irish descent; Senator Long is of American-Anglo-Saxon descent; Senator Fong is of American-Chinese descent; Representative Inouye is of American-Japanese descent; and Jimmy Kalealoha, elected Lieutenant Governor, is of American-Polynesian descent. They constitute a typical cross-section of Hawaii's population and a proof of its ethnic democracy.

I think the United States is fortunate in this development and in the fact that the visits of Senator FONG and Representative INOUYE to the Orient as messengers of good-will and living embodiments of our democracy have brought great returns to Uncle Sam in better and truer understanding of what our Nation stands for.

I wish to commend what the senior Senator from California and the junior Senator from New York have just said on the question. I am happy to associate myself with their views.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, that is a worthwhile contribution from a splendid American and a great Senator. I thank him for it.

I believe the fact that the admission of Hawaii as the 50th State of this great Union is something in which we can take a great deal more pride and joy than the people of Hawaii themselves can take.

Mr. GRUENING. That is my view.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BYRD of West Virginia in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from California?

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the Honorable HIRAM L. FONG, has been traveling at his own expense through the countries of the Orient; and

Whereas the favorable reaction of the people of these Pacific basin countries has been so uniformly favorable and has resulted in a much friendlier understanding between these countries and ours: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Republican Party of Hawaii proudly commends the Honorable HIRAM L. FONG for the unselfish devotion to his duties as a U.S. Senator representing the State of Hawaii.

VISIT BY SENATOR MUSKIE, OF MAINE, TO POLAND

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, at the conclusion of the investigation which a special Senate subcommittee had undertaken of Russia's development of its vast hydroelectric resources, the distinguished junior Senator from Maine [Mr. MUSKIE], a member of the subcommittee, on his way home, stopped off in Poland. It was his purpose to find the village from which his father had emigrated 59 years before. He wanted to visit his father's birthplace and the graves of his paternal ancestors and, if possible, to find any relative who might still be alive.

On his return he recounted his experience in a news release. In my view, and in that of others who have read Senator MUSKIE's moving account, our beloved colleague from Maine has made a memorable contribution to that enduring literature which embodies the heart and soul of the American idea. It reemphasizes the utterance, some years ago, of President Franklin Delano Roosevelt, that once all Americans were immigrants. But beyond that, Senator MUSKIE's release makes vivid that we, the descendants of immigrants to America, must be eternally grateful to our fathers and forefathers who had the vision and the initiative to leave the old world and seek freedom and greater opportunity in the new.

Sometimes it would appear that some of our fellow citizens whose pioneering ancestors many generations ago courageously embarked on an uncharted course and left the old world, with its restrictions, rigidities, oppressions and inequalities, may have, to a degree, lost that passion for and understanding of what their forefathers envisioned and sought. But to those whose personal experiences and recollections of what America meant to our forebears are still fresh—the first, second, and perhaps even the third generation of immigrants—EDMUND MUSKIE's message of renewal carries a special significance and poignancy.

I ask unanimous consent that our colleague's inspired narrative be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the newsletter by Senator MUSKIE was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

As I record this I am sitting at my desk at home, relaxed and thoroughly enjoying the American way of life after 35 days away from it. It has been good for me personally to be exposed to the people and the customs and the intellectual, political, and economic climate of the Soviet Union. The experience highlighted those values which make America such a wonderful place in which to live and intensified my appreciation of them. I hope and believe that the experience will be of real value in connection with my duties as a U.S. Senator.

By fortuitous circumstances, Clayton LaVerdiere, of the Waterville Morning Sentinel, arranged with Jane to use excerpts from my letters to her as a report to the citizens of Maine on my travels. I hope they proved of interest. They could not possibly constitute a comprehensive report of all our new experiences and impressions. In particular, I avoided detailed discussion relative to our primary mission, that of evaluating the status and pace of hydroelectric power developments in the U.S.S.R. There is much material to be digested and analyzed in proper perspective before the subcommittee, and its staff will state firm conclusions or consider recommendations. There is no question, however, as to the very considerable momentum which the Soviet Union has developed in this field.

My letters to Jane did not touch upon my 2 days in Poland, it being obvious that I would reach home before any letters which I might write from Warsaw. Yesterday, October 26, for example, my fourth day at home, Jane received a letter which I wrote in Leningrad on October 15th. Airmail has not yet caught up with the jet age. Apparently, also, it takes a little longer for mail to pierce the Iron Curtain.

As you know, my father was born in Poland. He left it 59 years ago at the age of 17 in search of freedom and opportunity. He found both, not only for himself, but also for his children, and for that we will be eternally grateful. At the same time, he always spoke to us warmly of his homeland, its loveliness, and the scenes of his childhood.

Remote as the possibility seemed, I wanted to find the village where he was born, in order that I might trod in his name the soil to which he never found it possible to return in his lifetime. I found it. A tiny rural village called Jasionowka, 20-odd miles north of Bialystok, not too far from the Russian border, at what was described to me by Deputy Foreign Minister Winiewicz as the saddest part of Poland.

To reach it, Frank and Mrs. Jones, of the American Embassy, and I drove 75 miles northeasterly from Warsaw. The main roads in Poland are excellent and we made good time—thoroughly enjoying the flat but pleasant and attractive countryside and the mild and sunny autumn day. As we approached the village, we passed, of all coincidences, a lake with a familiar name, Augusta. At this point, I became profoundly moved as I considered in a matter of minutes my eyes would see fields, streams, and trees and possibly even faces that my father's eyes had seen last more than half a century before.

We had left the main road and were driving over a narrow, cobbled country road. As we topped a slight rise, there came into view in the distance a large white building, somewhat shabby, but clinging to the shreds of an ancient dignity which I instinctively felt must be the manor house of a nobleman's estate which my grandfather had managed at the turn of the century. And so it proved to be, now converted to a state farm with a new barn, some battered older buildings, ruins of others and a small duck pond which may have been a favorite spot for children in my father's day. A short distance beyond, the pitiful, unpainted, weather-beaten homes of the villagers were clustered about a broad square, dominated by the stately white church which my father attended.

In sharp contrast to the Soviet Union, the Poles are devout in their belief in God and extremely conscientious in discharging their religious duties. It was heartwarming to see them swarming to the church on Sunday morning, walking, on bicycles, or in spotless wagons, behind their horses. Their extremely difficult economic and political circumstances seem simply to strengthen their faith in God's purposes.

With little more than an hour at my disposal, my first objective was to find some trace of my father's family. We proceeded to the local presidium and almost immediately located a friendly girl who recalled an old lady bearing the family name. She escorted us to a drab little house on one of the side streets. We knocked on the door and entered. In a dark little cubby hole of a kitchen, I met the widow of my father's brother, tiny and stooped under the weight of almost 80 years. With her was my father's niece, herself a widow with a young child, her husband killed in the war. Having grasped the almost incomprehensible fact of my identity, my cousin quickly showed me pictures of my father and my mother which he had sent her long years ago and letters he had written. They did not know of his death and accepted his silence over the past 3 years as just another of the burdens which filled their daily lives. The sister my father left behind is also dead, leaving three sons who were away at work and unavailable during my visit. I met the wife of one of them, whose first question related to the possibility of coming to America.

At this point, the local grapevine had spread the word and the street in front of the little house swarmed with villagers. They were obviously delighted to welcome me and wanted to know all about me and my family. A surveillance team had picked us up on the border of Bialystok Province and followed us. The villagers were highly amused when these two representatives of the state police rather shamefacedly refused my invitation to pose for pictures, which I said I wanted to show the Deputy Foreign Minister when I met him that afternoon.

It is difficult to comprehend the economic circumstances of the people in that little village—the bareness of their lives. They have no meat; they stand in line for bread. Their diet appears to consist of potatoes and cabbage. The monthly wage is roughly the equivalent of $10 to $20. Their personal possessions are almost unbelievably meager. This is indeed the saddest part of Poland. But for my father's dream of freedom and opportunity this would be my life—the life of my children.

And what of the people who live this life? They have courage. They have their belief, and their faith in God. They value friendship, and love, and family ties, and derive such happiness as they know from these. Sadly, however, they have no hope that their lot will be improved, and the result is a deep apathy which stifles ambition and interest in the public issues which will shape their future.

Poland is a country in an almost hopeless political and economic dilemma. Its people historically have cherished independence and freedom and love of country above all else. Geographically today they find themselves in such proximity to the Russian colossus that like the turtle, they are forced to withdraw into the shell of their obvious security alliances. Were they free to do otherwise, their hearts and their traditions would take them elsewhere.

Economically, following the war, the Russians, in their own interests, developed an industrial complex in Poland, notably steel and textiles, which make the country almost irrevocably committed to the Soviet Union for the necessary raw materials. It must rely upon coal and agriculture for the exports to balance its international payment, and its agricultural lands are fragmentized into small holdings which are committed to ancient unmechanized methods and practices which fall far short of the production necessary to meet domestic needs and export requirements. These current difficulties, which I have probably oversimplified for sake of brevity, plus centuries of living in the crossroads of war in Eastern Europe, have made my father's village what it is today.

The past and the present have created a far different, more comfortable, and better world for me than they have for my cousins.

Must this be?

What does the future hold?

We speak constantly of a just peace. We pray for it. And what would a just peace mean to my cousins? And there are many, many more millions in the world, living in circumstances no better and, indeed, far worse than they.

Before I left the village, I visited the cemetery in search of my grandparents' graves. There was no trace. As is so often the case in Europe, they are probably at rest two or three layers deep. People have lived, died, for many, many centuries in this part of the world, some with their grinding misery and their fleeting happiness, some with flaming hopes, and others with forlorn hopelessness; some with lives of abundance and others with lives of emptiness.

Europe is an ancient civilization. We are an outgrowth of it, and out of this deep past, its lessons and experience as well as its aspirations, we seek the promise of a brighter future for all mankind. Can we find it? May God will it so.

As we drove away from the village, I caught a last glimpse of the white church, gleaming as it shed its shabbiness in the sunlight and the distance. Suddenly and hauntingly, I felt myself to be the second generation bearer of the dream of freedom and opportunity which prompted my father to leave his home behind him. This is 10:45 p.m. Tbilise time, or 2:45 p.m. Washington time.

A LONG OVERDUE MEMORIAL TO TEDDY ROOSEVELT

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, this morning it was my honor to have my picture taken before the bust of Vice President—and later President—Theodore Roosevelt, which is located on the principal floor of the Senate wing of the Capitol. My companion for the photograph was Vice President NIXON.

It is fitting that Vice President NIXON, who exemplifies many of the fine qualities of Teddy Roosevelt, should be in the forefront of the effort to establish a suitable memorial to that great leader. In pursuit of this goal, the Vice President today sent the following letter to every Member of Congress:

Enclosed is a copy of the final report of the Theodore Roosevelt Centennial Commission. We feel that a great deal was accomplished during the year-long observance of the anniversary of Theodore Roosevelt's birth and that we were able to achieve most, if not all, of the objectives laid down by the law which created the Commission.

Let me call your attention to page 47 of the report, however, and to that one major aim which yet awaits action, namely, the completion of the Theodore Roosevelt National Memorial in Washington.

You may recall that the Theodore Roosevelt Association, 30 years ago, presented Theodore Roosevelt Island, a 90-acre tract in the Potomac, to the American people for the establishment of a suitable memorial. A bill calling for an appropriation of $886,400 for the construction of this memorial is now before the Congress. When it has been approved, this tribute to one of our most distinguished Presidents will be well on its way to realization.

The legislation referred to will come before the Congress for action during the coming session. It is the sincere hope of the members of the Commission that you may lend your support to the creation of this memorial to one of our great American Presidents.

Yours sincerely,

RICHARD NIXON.

As a cosponsor of Senate bill 2561, which seeks to provide for the construction of a Theodore Roosevelt Memorial on Theodore Roosevelt Island, in the Potomac River, I am pleased to have this strong backing for a memorial to one of New York's most illustrious sons. Suitable homage from the Nation to which he contributed so much is long overdue, and I am hopeful that in this session of Congress final passage of this measure will be achieved, so that work on the memorial can proceed without further delay.

In this connection, the incomparable Bess Furman, of the New York Times, this fall penned a most interesting article concerning plans for the Theodore Roosevelt Memorial. I ask unanimous consent to have Miss Furman's article printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Nov. 29, 1959]

WASHINGTON PLANS FOR ROOSEVELT (T.R.) ISLAND

(By Bess Furman)

WASHINGTON.—Three important structural developments close together, involving the Potomac shore and Theodore Roosevelt Island in the river, are destined to change the face of this Capital City in the area between the Lincoln Memorial and Georgetown, upstream.

These are the proposed Constitution Avenue Bridge, a continuation of Constitution Avenue crossing Theodore Roosevelt Island to the Virginia side, thus seeking to relieve downtown Washington's heavy traffic congestion; the striking National Cultural Center, to rise beside the river at the foot of New Hampshire Avenue between the proposed bridge and the mouth of Rock Creek, facing out toward the beautiful wooded island; and the Theodore Roosevelt Memorial. The bridge is to be built on the island, now a bird sanctuary and free of all human habitation.

The bill to construct the three-tiered bridge with its complex approach system seems sure to pass Congress at its next session. The bill will give access to the island and make it one of Washington's showplaces. The memorial will be visible from the bridge.

The cultural center's design, by the New York architect Edward D. Stone, includes an opera house to seat from 3,000 to 4,000; a concert hall, to seat 3,000; a theater of 1,000 to 1,800 capacity, and two smaller auditoriums for plays and lectures. It is to cost $61 million.

As for the memorial project, Theodore Roosevelt Island, about a mile long and half a mile wide, has been the subject of several previous acts of Congress.

TERMS OF BILL

The bill now pending provides "that the Secretary of the Interior shall erect on Roosevelt Island such monument or memorial to the memory of Theodore Roosevelt, and related structures, as may be approved by the Theodore Roosevelt Association, the Commission of Fine Arts, and the National Capital Planning Commission." It would authorize appropriation of such sums as may be necessary.

For legislation of modest cost—about $500,000—it could not have more distinguished backing. In the House, Speaker SAM RAYBURN, Democrat, of Texas, lent his prestige by being photographed with the architect's drawing of the memorial and its chief sponsors, RICHARD M. SIMPSON, Republican, of Pennsylvania, and LEO O'BRIEN, Democrat, of New York. In the Senate, Minority Leader EVERETT DIRKSEN, Republican, of Illinois, joined with New York's two Senators, JACOB K. JAVITS and KENNETH KEATING, as sponsors.

When completed, the Theodore Roosevelt Memorial will be a blood brother to Rockefeller Center, for it was Paul Manship, the sculptor of the statue of Prometheus there, who conceived the large bronze celestial sphere that will be the principal feature of the memorial. The sphere will be about 40 feet in diameter and about 60 feet high.

BAS RELIEF

At the center of the granite base on which it is to rest there will be a bas relief of Theodore Roosevelt. The sphere, placed beside a reflecting pool, will be at the center of a court 150 feet wide and 200 feet deep, bordered by trees. On 12 granite panels, each 10 feet high and 20 feet wide, spaced on three sides of the court, will be carved Theodore Roosevelt's most famous statements on government. Eric Gugler is the architect.

Erection of the memorial will carry out plans formulated about a quarter of a century ago. These can now be put in effect, because Congress has finally decided where it will put the new bridge. On the island, however, anyone wishing to commune with the spirit of Theodore Roosevelt will have to do so on foot. In honor of that nature lover, only foot trails are allowed there. In any case, the island has had a colorful history.

The Indians, of course, were there first, giving it the name spelled with quaint variations on early maps—"Anticostan," "Analostian," "Anacostien," and later "Analostan," a name it held until the Hoover administration. When the colonies were formed, it was called "My Lord's Island," for it belonged to Lord Baltimore.

In 1717 it was bought by George Mason, the father of the father of the Bill of Rights. It descended to the famous George, the master of Gunston Hall, who willed it to his son, John Mason. The island was a possession of the wealthy and powerful Virginia family for 125 years. So it was "Mason's I," on the maps of early Washington, in which it was included.

The island's most glamorous period began in the 1790's when the building of the Federal city was being started. When John Mason inherited it from his father in 1792, he already was the leading banker of Georgetown, had a monopoly on the ferry to the Virginia shore and possessed large business and property interests in the District of Columbia.

FRENCH PLAN

He had spent much time in Paris looking after the Mason family overseas shipping interests and he envisaged the island as one of those well-barbered rural retreats popular in France. That was the way in which he developed it. The handsome home he erected at its highest spot, commanding a view of building operations at the White House and the Capitol, has been attributed in its design to George Hadfield, one of the early Architects of the Capitol.

The Mason home in its heyday was described by David Baillie Warden, British consul at Georgetown in 1810, in a book published in Paris in 1816.

"Its interior is finished in costly style by its opulent owner," wrote Warden. "The garden is kept in fine order, ornamental trees, shrubs, and rare plants are a source of attraction to botanists."

He described servants' quarters, summerhouses, flora and fauna. He said the snapping turtles grew so big that when General Mason threw one of them in his canoe, "it attacked him so furiously he was obliged to leap into the water." Large turtle eggs, he said, were a staple of diet.

Looking riverward from a summerhouse, he narrated, "We perceive the sails only as if by enchantment gliding through the trees."

HOST TO THE GREAT

John Mason entertained the great men of his time, including Louis Philippe, later King of France, at his island home. A central hall connected the ornamental front stoop and formal back terrace, with a drawing room on one side of the hall and, on the other, a dining room that opened into a bedroom wing, beneath which were basement kitchens and a wine cellar.

It was in this home in 1797 that James Murray Mason was born. He later became a cause célèbre in the Civil War when he was sent with John Slidell by President Jefferson Davis of the Confederacy to negotiate with Great Britain—only to be captured by a U.S. naval vessel and detained for some time at Boston before being allowed to resume his journey to Europe.

It was in January 1805, that Congress passed its first act concerning Analostan Island, a move destined to be disastrous both to Georgetown and the Mason family. It provided that Georgetown would be permitted to build a causeway from the island to the Virginia shore to expedite the stage route and to improve the navigation of the river by diverting the main flow of Little River, along the Virginia shore, to the District of Columbia side of the river.

The city of Georgetown had no intention of building this combined dam and causeway, which was, in fact, a private enterprise project by the owner of the stage line, John Mason. On July 1, 1805, a legal paper was drawn up through which Georgetown empowered Mason to build the causeway 30 feet wide and 8 feet above high tide. It was to be "secured by parapet walls 4 feet high above the top of the dam or base of the said road made thereon."

One local historian has declared that this causeway "caused a gradual filling in of the channel and contributed to the decline of the town (Georgetown) as a seaport." Another noted: "The marshes created by the causeway brought swarms of mosquitoes which rendered the island uninhabitable and the Masons eventually quit it." The fine house went to rack and ruin. Then, in 1869, it suffered a devastating fire.

Meantime, floods washed out the Mason causeway, the mosquito blight abated and colorful events were resumed on the island under various auspices and ownerships. On July 4, 1834, there was a balloon ascension from the island, seen by between 6,000 and 7,000 people. In the 1850's, Mayor William A. Bradley was host there at lavish picnics.

PONTOON BRIDGE

Early in the Civil War, it was said to have served as a Confederate recruiting office. Later, Union forces threw a pontoon bridge across to it, and Mathew B. Brady took a picture to prove it. Hardly was the war over when an annual custom of crowning a Queen of Love and Beauty was initiated. Harper's Weekly of October 7, 1865, describes, with elaborate sketches, the crowning, the tilting of the ring that preceded it, and the dancing in the moonlight that followed.

In the 1880's the Columbia Athletic Club operated the island as a race track and ball field. In the early nineties a sprinter set a record for the 100-yard dash there. In August of 1907, the whole place was almost sold for $100,000 to a New York amusement company to create a new "Coney Island." On January 8, 1932, the Roosevelt Memorial Association bought it from the Washington Gas Light Co., which had planned to use it commercially. The memorial association then offered it to the Nation as a shrine.

Again there was an act of Congress—that of May 31, 1932—accepting the gift and changing the name to Roosevelt Island. The deed was presented to President Herbert Hoover in ceremonies at the White House on December 13, 1932. Already Franklin D. Roosevelt had been elected President. In January 1933, Congress acted once more, making it Theodore Roosevelt Island to clarify for all time which President Roosevelt was being memorialized.

Franklin D. Roosevelt zestfully pushed the memorial plan projected by Olmstead Bros., architects of Brookline, Mass., which neatly dovetailed into a trio of his New Deal projects. The purpose was to transform the island into a natural forest and wildlife sanctuary memorializing the love of Theodore Roosevelt for the out of doors. Specified was creation of openings through the trees to simulate foot-worn forest trails somewhat irregular in width and alinement; construction of a $135,000 overlook and razing of the Mason ruins.

Into Washington from Fort Hoyle, Vt., was brought a Civilian Conservation Corps company, which established a base of operations in November 1934 at the Virginia end of the Arlington Memorial Bridge.

This was called Camp Arlington, and the main task of its members was the development of Theodore Roosevelt Island. That project was still going strong when President Roosevelt took the King of England to visit Camp Arlington in June 1939.

AUTHOR-WORKER

The first project superintendent, a handy man with camera and typewriter, wrote a 1934–35 historical scrapbook now in the National Archives. The first hard winter the CCC boys crossed over on the ice, when it was safe, at intervals between such chores as clearing superheavy snows from White House drives and the Potomac Park pool for skating.

When the CCC boys cut down and sawed up the trees that the Olmstead Brothers blazed as diseased or unsuited to a forest primeval, WPA workers came in from the city and carted them off to the municipal woodyard run for families on relief.

As many as 40 men from the relief rolls were working at one time, according to the superintendent's scrapbook.

But all did not go well along the irregular, footworn trails that were being looped around the island. Letters in National Park Service files reflected a growing feeling that, despite the setting out of large numbers of appropriate trees, the forest primeval remained academic, and that the plan for an overlook had been too long delayed. Eventually the overlook was abandoned in favor of the Manship-Gugler sphere.

ROADBUILDING

Along came World War II, then a long controversy as to whether a superhighway must be routed across a natural forest and wildlife refuge. Congress decreed that Washington traffic being what it is, that it certainly must—and that Roosevelt Island would just have to adjust.

Meanwhile, any weekend afternoon from June through October, anyone can go to the Wisconsin Avenue waterfront in Georgetown, take a free 3-minute ride to Theodore Roosevelt Island, and see how things are getting along. If he pauses at the orientation station until a small crowd collects, a National Parks Service ranger will show up and give a conducted tour and nature lecture.

The island has added unto itself 18 acres, bringing the total to 88 in the last 100 years. Now the marshlands and swamplands are nearly as long as the island itself, with trees, shrubs, and flowers in striking contrast to those of the hardwood forest on the higher and dried ground where the old house was. The only discernible remnants of human habitation are some beds of English ivy.

GOVERNOR ROCKEFELLER'S LEGISLATIVE MESSAGE WINS HIGH PRAISE

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, frequently I have asserted my strong conviction that the Federal Government should not encroach upon problems which are being adequately handled at the State and local levels. Ideally, the government which is closest to the people should be in the best position to respond to their needs and wishes. The strength of our Republic and the vigor of democracy in this country depend to a large extent on the willingness of the States to meet their own responsibilities.

Yesterday, Governor Rockefeller delivered his annual message to the New York State Legislature. His message outlined for the Empire State a program which is worthy of the widest emulation. In a lead editorial in this morning's New York Herald Tribune, this program is described as reflective of "a progressive dynamic appreciation of this great States needs." In another highly favorable editorial, today's New York Times comments that—when so many people, even in a democracy, think of government as something to be endured, or at the extreme a costly nuisance, and too often also regard officeholders, including legislators, as unworthy inferiors, the Governor lifts our sights, applies a needed corrective.

These editorials suggest that under the leadership of Governor Rockefeller, New York is one State that will not shirk its responsibilities.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the editorials be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Herald Tribune, Jan. 7, 1960]

ROCKEFELLER'S DYNAMIC PROGRAM

Governor Rockefeller, entering his second year at Albany, says to the Legislature: "I am happy to report that we have restored fiscal integrity."

New York's financial house is in order, thanks to last year's tough decision to raise taxes. The State is on a complete pay-as-you-go basis. The budget won't be any bigger. Almost needless to say, there will be no new taxes or tax increases. Also, however, no general tax cut.

This stability, in the Governor's view, was prerequisite to practically everything else.

Where then does Mr. Rockefeller lead from here?

Quite properly the Governor concerns himself at length with the growing economy and the individual's share therein. He points to a record number of jobs, but sets nothing less than full employment as his goal. He is still on the hunt for more industry and points vigorously to the need for increased electric power.

He advocates strengthened activity in developing atomic energy. He recommends a public works stockpile and urges undiminished highway construction despite lagging Federal funds. He wants tax adjustments to spur small business. But he also counsels an overall $1 hourly minimum wage as well as increased benefits in unemployment insurance and workmen's compensation.

In short, where the economy is healthy and expanding the individual is served best.

But Mr. Rockefeller's message is by no means all economics. One of the most important sections, to be detailed later, deals with schools. Here the public need is growing fast, and the Governor says bluntly that the localities cannot carry the load by property taxation alone.

His answer is to provide new sources of revenue through the voluntary establishment of federated districts empowered to levy local nonproperty taxes. To broaden the tax base means that the people at home, after getting State aid, can decide for themselves exactly how they would like to obtain the rest of the money.

In civil rights Mr. Rockefeller is clearly sympathetic to the need for doing something about discrimination in private housing. He is also extremcly anxious about middle-income housing and hopes to attract a lot more private capital than has been so far forthcoming. The Governor will spell out his views on both these aspects of housing as the session progresses.

Among many other Rockefeller task-force researches is that on the cost and adequacy of medical service. The Governor says the problem of individual catastrophic expense must be dealt with, but he is careful to point out that this is a national as well as State concern. The forthcoming report should be highly interesting.

Then there are a number of major action programs already offered, such as reorganization of the executive branch, the strengthening of local government as part of a constructive sample of constitutional revision and another go at court reform. Also such relatively noncontroversial plans as the comprehensive attack on juvenile delinquency and the all-out proposals for improving highway safety.

What we have, then, is a progressive, dynamic appreciation of this great State's needs. It demands that government must serve the people effectively and economically, and that such action means progress. The challenges are there to be conquered. In this task Governor Rockefeller has well demonstrated his vision and leadership. And he is doubtless aware that not only New York but the entire Nation is watching.

[From the New York Times, Jan. 7, 1960]

THE GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE

Governor Rockefeller in his second annual message to the New York Legislature places a constructive program for lawmaking within the framework of preamble and conclusion that emphasize the fateful importance, in our time, of governing well and thus strengthening the free world. He does this with eloquence and conviction; as a man now withdrawn from the competition for higher office he can speak of broad principles and not be suspected of politics.

When so many people, even in a democracy, think of government as something to be endured, or at the extreme a costly nuisance, and too often also regard officeholders, including legislators, as unworthy inferiors, the Governor lifts our sights, applies a needed corrective. Looking ahead through the 1960's, he sees a decade that is ours to use, or ours to waste; ours for the sufferance of evil events, or ours for the creation of great events. The public servants of our State, of every State, indeed all responsible officers of every free government in the world, face the stark and immediate challenge of proving that representative government can work, serving all the people, securing freedom and achieving justice for all.

The basic proposition of his message, as Mr. Rockefeller sees it, is that with our abiding concern the worth and dignity of the individual, we must be ruled and inspired by awareness that, in the deepest political sense, all things are one thing. And the one thing so urgently demanded of us is to prove that freedom—its citizens, its leaders, and its laws—can work, can create, can endure, and can avail. "In this high purpose," the Governor adds, "let us know that each of us has his role to play."

Within this setting the Governor approaches the problems of New York. He sees the State's own fiscal integrity as an essential to economic growth; he proposes, by February 1, to submit a budget whose appropriations will not exceed those of the current year and which will achieve complete pay-as-you-go financing. He reports that his revitalized department of commerce has had conspicuous success in encouraging employment increase and industrial expansion. He proposes to assist small business with tax changes.

Much of his message is devoted to labor. He will convene a conference on automation, which "must be faced with realism and understanding." He urges a statutory minimum wage of $1 an hour for workers, with some exceptions. He would increase unemployment insurance, workmen's compensation and disability benefits, proposes important other protections of the individual and family.

The passage on education is, of course, fraught with interest and probable political controversy. He will present a program to authorize the levying of local, nonproperty taxes and the establishment of new federated school districts with tax-levying powers. Convinced that the local cost of education can no longer be met by real estate taxation alone, he advances the theory that "those who spend school funds should participate in the decision as to how they should be obtained." He promises—and this will be read with interest and details awaited with eager suspense—"additional State aid beyond present statutory requirements."

Many important sections have been anticipated. Reorganization of the executive branch and constitutional revision will be pushed. Highway safety, juvenile delinquency, housing bias, needs of the aged, narcotic addiction, vocational rehabilitation, mental health (with a new research institute for the mentally retarded), middle-income housing, water resources, recreational facilities, an advisory council on the arts—these are among the subjects treated. A number of special messages are promised.

So the legislature has agenda, to which its members will add their contribution, for substantial accomplishment, devoid of sensational innovation, but progressive.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I move that the Senate stand in adjournment until Monday next, at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 16 minutes p.m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, January 11, 1960, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, JANUARY 7, 1960

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Romans 15: 13: Now the God of peace be with you all.

Almighty God, as we go forth into the days of this new year, wilt Thou bestow upon us the blessings of Thy love and grace.

We humbly pray Thee to forgive our sins, emancipate us from all fears, exalt our aspirations, and enlarge our vision.

May our President, our Speaker, and the Members of Congress be endowed with wisdom and understanding as they face difficult problems for which there seems to be no adequate solution and are called upon to make decisions for which they have no precedent.

In times of turmoil and confusion, when we are tempted to become disheartened, wilt Thou reveal unto us those resources of power which will enable us to be strong and steadfast.

We thank Thee for the life and ministry of Thy servant, one of our colleagues who walked and worked with us for a little while upon this earth. Thou hast opened unto him the gateway to the larger life and received him into Thy nearer presence. Grant unto the members of his bereaved family the consolations of Thy grace.

Hear us in Christ's name. Amen.

THE STATE OF THE UNION—ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 241)

The PRESIDENT. Mr. President, Mr. Speaker, Members of the 86th Congress, my fellow citizens, 7 years ago I entered my present office with one long-held resolve overriding all others. I was then, and remain now, determined that the United States shall become an ever more potent resource for the cause of peace [applause]—realizing that peace cannot be for ourselves alone, but for peoples everywhere. This determination is, I know, shared by the entire Congress—indeed, by all Americans.

My purpose today is to discuss some features of America's position, both at home and in her relations to others.

First, I point out that for us, annual self-examination is made a definite necessity by the fact that we now live in a divided world of uneasy equilibrium, with our side committed to its own protection and against aggression by the other. [Applause.]

With both sections of this divided world in possession of unbelievably destructive weapons, mankind approaches a state where mutual annihilation becomes a possibility. No other fact of today's world equals this in importance—it colors everything we say, plan, and do.

There is demanded of us, vigilance, determination, and the dedication of whatever portion of our resources that will provide adequate security, especially provide a real deterrent to aggression. These things we are doing.

All these facts emphasize the importance of striving incessantly for a just peace.

Only through the strengthening of the spiritual, intellectual, economic, and defensive resources of the free world can we, in confidence, make progress toward this goal.

Second, we note that recent Soviet deportment and pronouncements suggest the possible opening of a somewhat less strained period in the relationships between the Soviet Union and the rest of the world. If these pronouncements be genuine, there is brighter hope of diminishing the intensity of past rivalry and eventually of substituting persuasion for coercion. Whether this is to become an era of lasting promise remains to be tested by actions.

Third, we now stand in the vestibule of a vast new technological age—one that, despite its capacity for human destruction, has an equal capacity to make poverty and human misery obsolete. If our efforts are wisely directed—and if our unremitting efforts for dependable peace begin to attain some success—we can surely become participants in creating an age characterized by justice and rising levels of human well-being.

Over the past year the Soviet Union has expressed an interest in measures to reduce the common peril of war.

While neither we nor any other free world nation can permit ourselves to be misled by pleasant promises until they are tested by performance, yet we approach this apparently new opportunity with the utmost seriousness. We must strive to break the calamitous cycle of frustrations and crises which, if unchecked, could spiral into nuclear disaster; the ultimate insanity.

Though the need for dependable agreements to assure against resort to force in settling disputes is apparent to both sides, yet, as in other issues dividing men and nations, we cannot expect sudden and revolutionary results. But we must find some place to begin.

One obvious road on which to make a useful start is in the widening of communication between our two peoples. In this field there are, both sides willing, countless opportunities—most of them well known to us all—for developing mutual understanding, the true foundation of peace.

Another avenue may be through the reopening, on January 12, of negotiations looking to a controlled ban on the testing of nuclear weapons. Unfortunately, the closing statement from the Soviet scientists who met with our scientists at Geneva gives the clear impression that their conclusions have been politically guided. Those of the British and American scientific representatives are their own freely formed, individual and collective opinions. I am hopeful that as new negotiations begin, truth—not political opportunism—will guide the deliberations.

Still another field may be found in the field of disarmament, in which the Soviets have professed a readiness to negotiate seriously. They have not, however, made clear the plans they may have, if any, for mutual inspection and verification—the essential condition for any extensive measure of disarmament.

There is one instance where our initiative for peace has recently been successful. A multilateral treaty signed last month provides for the exclusively peaceful use of Antarctica, assured by a system of inspection. It provides for free and cooperative scientific research in that continent, and prohibits nuclear explosions there pending general international agreement on the subject.

I shall transmit its text to the Senate for consideration and approval in the near future.

The treaty is a significant contribution toward peace, international cooperation, and the advancement of science.

The United States is always ready to participate with the Soviet Union in serious discussion of these or any other subjects that may lead to peace with justice.

Certainly it is not necessary to repeat that the United States has no intention of interfering in the internal affairs of any nation; by the same token we reject any attempt to impose its system on us or on other peoples by force or subversion.

This concern for the freedom of other peoples is the intellectual and spiritual cement which has allied us with more than 40 other nations in a common defense effort. Not for a moment do we forget that our own fate is firmly fastened to that of these countries; we will not act in any way which would jeopardize our solemn commitments to them.

We and our friends are, of course, concerned with self-defense. Growing out of this concern is the realization that all people of the free world have a great stake in the progress, in freedom, of the uncommitted and newly emerging nations.

These peoples, desperately hoping to lift themselves to decent levels of living must not, by our neglect, be forced to seek help from, and finally become virtual satellites of, those who proclaim their hostility to freedom.

Their natural desire for a better life must not be frustrated by withholding from them necessary technical and investment assistance. This is a problem to be solved not by America alone, but also by every nation cherishing the same ideals and in position to provide help.

In recent years America's partners and friends in Western Europe and Japan have made great economic progress. Their newly found economic strength is eloquent testimony to the striking success of the policies of economic cooperation which we and they have pursued.

The international economy of 1960 is markedly different from that of the early postwar years. No longer is the United States the only major industrial country capable of providing substantial amounts of the resources so urgently needed in the newly developing countries.

To remain secure and prosperous themselves, wealthy nations must extend the kind of cooperation to the less fortunate members that will inspire hope, confidence, and progress. A rich nation can for a time, without noticeable damage to itself, pursue a course of self-indulgence, making its single goal the material ease and comfort of its own citizens—thus repudiating its own spiritual and material stake in a peaceful and prosperous society of nations. But the enmities it will incur, the isolation into which it will descend, and the internal moral and spiritual, economic, and political softness that will be engendered, will, in the long term, bring it to disaster.

America did not become great through softness and self-indulgence. Her miraculous progress and achievements flow from other qualities far more worthy and substantial—adherence to principles and methods consonant with our religious philosophy, a satisfaction in hard work, the readiness to sacrifice for worthwhile causes, the courage to meet every challenge, the intellectual honesty and capacity to recognize the true path of her own best interests.

To us and to every nation of the free world, rich or poor, these qualities are necessary today as never before if we are to march together to greater security, prosperity, and peace. [Applause.]

I believe the industrial countries are ready to participate actively in supplementing the efforts of the developing nations to achieve progress.

The immediate need for this kind of cooperation is underscored by the strain in our international balance of payments. Our surplus from foreign business transactions has in recent years fallen substantially short of the expenditures we make abroad to maintain our military establishments overseas, to finance private investment, and to provide assistance to the less developed nations. In 1959 our deficit in balance of payments approached $4 billion.

Continuing deficits of anything like this magnitude would, over time, impair our own economic growth and check the forward progress of the free world.

We must meet this situation by promoting a rising volume of exports and world trade. Further, we must induce all industrialized nations of the free world to work together to help lift the scourge of poverty from less fortunate nations. This will provide for better sharing of this burden and for still further profitable trade.

New nations, and others struggling with the problems of development, will progress only, regardless of any outside help, if they demonstrate faith in their own destiny and possess the will and use their own resources to fulfill it.

Moreover, progress in a national transformation can be only gradually earned; there is no easy and quick way to follow from the oxcart to the jetplane. But, just as we drew on Europe for assistance in our earlier years, so now do those new and emerging nations that have this faith and determination deserve help.

Over the last 15 years, 20 nations have gained political independence. Others are doing so each year. Most of them are woefully lacking in technical capacity and in investment capital; without free world support in these matters they cannot effectively progress in freedom.

Respecting their need, one of the major focal points of our concern is the south Asian region. Here, in two nations alone, are almost 500 million people, all working, and working hard, to raise their standards, and in doing so, to make of themselves a strong bulwark against the spread of an ideology that would destroy liberty.

I cannot express to you the depth of my conviction that, in our own and free world interests, we must cooperate with others to help these people achieve their legitimate ambitions, as expressed in their different multiyear plans. Through the World Bank and other instrumentalities, as well as through individual action by every nation in position to help, we must squarely face this titanic challenge.

All of us must realize, of course, that development in freedom by the newly emerging nations, is no mere matter of obtaining outside financial assistance. An indispensable element in this process is a strong and continuing determination on the part of these nations to exercise the national discipline necessary for any sustained development period. These qualities of determination are particularly essential because of the fact that the process of improvement will necessarily be gradual and laborious rather than revolutionary. Moreover, everyone should be aware that the development process is no short term phenomenon. Many years are required for even the most favorably situated countries.

I shall continue to urge the American people, in the interests of their own security, prosperity, and peace, to make sure that their own part of this great project be amply and cheerfully supported. Free world decisions in this matter may spell the difference between world disaster and world progress in freedom.

Other countries, some of which I visited last month, have similar needs.

A common meeting ground is desirable for those nations which are prepared to assist in the development effort. During the past year I have discussed this matter with the leaders of several Western nations.

Because of its wealth of experience, the Organization for European Economic Cooperation could help with initial studies needed. The goal is to enlist all available economic resources in the industrialized free world—especially private investment capital. But I repeat that this help, no matter how great, can be lastingly effective only if it is used as a supplement to the strength of spirit and will of the people of the newly developing nations.

By extending this help we hope to make possible the enthusiastic enrollment of these nations under freedom's banner. No more startling contrast to a system of sullen satellites could be imagined. [Applause.]

If we grasp this opportunity to build an age of productive partnership between the less fortunate nations and those that have already achieved a high state of economic advancement, we will make brighter the outlook for a world order based upon security, freedom, and peace. Otherwise, the outlook could be dark indeed. We face what may be a turning point in history, and we must act decisively.

As a nation we can successfully pursue these objectives only from a position of broadly based strength.

No matter how earnest is our quest for guaranteed peace, we must maintain a high degree of military effectiveness at the same time we are engaged in negotiating the issue of arms reduction. Until tangible and mutually enforceable arms reduction measures are worked out, we will not weaken the means of defending our institutions. [Applause.]

America possesses an enormous defense power. It is my studied conviction that no nation will ever risk general war against us unless we should be so foolish as to neglect the defense forces we now so powerfully support. It is worldwide knowledge that any nation which might be tempted today to attack the United States, even though our country might sustain great losses, would itself promptly suffer a terrible destruction. But I once again assure all peoples and all nations that the United States, except in defense, will never turn loose this destructive power.

During the past year, our long-range striking power, unmatched today in manned bombers, has taken on new strength as the Atlas intercontinental ballistic missile has entered the operational inventory. In 14 recent test launchings, at ranges of over 5,000 miles, Atlas has been striking on an average within 2 miles of the target. This is less than the length of a jet runway—well within the circle of total destruction.

Incidentally, there was an Atlas firing last night. From all reports so far received, its performance conformed to the high standards I have described.

Such performance is a great tribute to American scientists and engineers, who in the past 5 years have had to telescope time and technology to develop these long-range ballistic missiles, where America had none before.

This year, moreover, growing numbers of nuclear-powered submarines will enter our Active Forces, some to be armed with Polaris missiles. These remarkable ships and weapons, ranging the oceans, will be capable of accurate fire on targets virtually anywhere on earth. Impossible to destroy by surprise attack, they will become one of our most effective sentinels for peace.

To meet situations of less than general nuclear war, we continue to maintain our carrier forces, our many service units abroad, our always ready Army strategic forces and Marine Corps divisions, and the civilian components. The continuing modernization of these forces is a costly but necessary process, and is scheduled to go forward at a rate which will steadily add to our strength.

The deployment of a portion of these forces beyond our shores, on land and sea, is persuasive demonstration of our determination to stand shoulder-to-shoulder with our allies for collective security. Moreover, I have directed that steps be taken to program our military assistance to these allies on a longer range basis. This is necessary for a sounder collective defense system.

Next I refer to our program in space exploration, which is often mistakenly supposed to be an integral part of defense research and development.

We note that, first, America has made great contributions in the past 2 years to the world's fund of knowledge of astrophysics and space science. These discoveries are of present interest chiefly to the scientific community; but they are important foundation stones for more extensive exploration of outer space for the ultimate benefit of all mankind.

Second, our military missile program, going forward so successfully, does not suffer from our present lack of very large rocket engines, which are so necessary in distant space exploration. I am assured by experts that the thrust of our present missiles is fully adequate for defense requirements.

Third, the United States is pressing forward in the development of large rocket engines to place vehicles of many tons into space for exploration purposes.

Fourth, in the meantime, it is necessary to remember that we have only begun to probe the environment immediately surrounding the earth. Using launch systems presently available, we are developing satellites to scout the world's weather; satellite relay stations to facilitate and extend communications over the globe; for navigation aids to give accurate bearings to ships and aircraft; and for perfecting instruments to collect and transmit the data we seek. This is the area holding the most promise for early and useful applications of space technology.

Fifth, we have just completed a year's experience with our new space law. I believe it deficient in certain particulars and suggested improvements will be submitted to the Congress shortly.

The accomplishment of the many tasks I have alluded to requires the continuous strengthening of the spiritual, intellectual, and economic sinews of American life. The steady purpose of our society is to assure justice, before God, for every individual. We must be ever alert that freedom does not wither through the careless amassing of restrictive controls or the lack of courage to deal boldly with the giant issues of the day.

A year ago, when I met with you, the Nation was emerging from an economic downturn, even though the signs of resurgent prosperity were not then sufficiently convincing to the doubtful. Today our surging strength is apparent to everyone; 1960 promises to be the most prosperous year in our history.

Yet we continue to be afflicted by nagging disorders.

Among current problems that require solution, participated in by citizens as well as Government, are; the need to protect the public interest in situations of prolonged labor-management stalemate; the persistent refusal to come to grips with a critical problem in one sector of American agriculture; the continuing threat of inflation, together with the persisting tendency toward fiscal irresponsibility; in certain instances the denial to some of our citizens of equal protection of the law.

Every American was disturbed by the prolonged dispute in the steel industry and the protracted delay in reaching a settlement.

We are all relieved that a settlement has at last been achieved in that industry.

Percentagewise, by this settlement the increase to the steel companies in employment costs is lower than in any prior wage settlement since World War II.

It is also gratifying to note that despite the increase in wages and benefits several of the major steel producers have announced that there will be no increase in steel prices at this time. The national interest demands that in the period of industrial peace which has been assured by the new contract, both management and labor make every possible effort to increase efficiency and productivity in the manufacture of steel so that price increases can be avoided. [Applause.]

One of the lessons of this story is that the potential danger to the entire Nation of longer and greater strikes must be met. To insure against such possibilities we must of course depend primarily upon the good commonsense of the responsible individuals. It is my intention to encourage regular discussions between management and labor outside the bargaining table, to consider the interest of the public as well as their mutual interest in the maintenance of industrial peace, price stability, incentive for continuous investment and economic growth. Both the Executive and the Congress will, I know, be watching developments with keenest interest.

To me, it seems almost absurd that the United States should recognize the need, and so earnestly to seek, for cooperation among the nations unless we can achieve voluntary, dependable, abiding cooperation among the important segments of our own free society. Without such cooperation we cannot prosper.

Failure to face up to basic issues in areas other than those of labor-management can cause serious strains on the firm freedom supports of our society.

Agriculture is one of these areas.

Our basic farm laws were written 27 years ago, in an emergency effort to redress hardship caused by a worldwide depression. They were continued—and their economic distortions intensified—during World War II in order to provide incentives for production of food needed to sustain a war-torn world.

Today our farm problem is totally different. It is that of effectively adjusting to the changes caused by a scientific revolution. When the original farm laws were written, an hour's farm labor produced only one-fourth as much wheat as at present. Farm legislation is woefully out of date, ineffective, and expensive. [Applause.]

For years we have gone on with an outmoded system which not only has failed to protect farm income, but also has produced soaring, threatening surpluses. Our farms have been left producing for war while America has long been at peace.

Once again I urge Congress to enact legislation that will gear production more closely to markets, make costly surpluses more manageable, provide greater freedom in farm operations, and steadily achieve increased net farm incomes. [Applause.]

Another issue that we must meet squarely is that of living within our means. This requires restraint in expenditure, constant reassessment of priorities, and the maintenance of stable prices.

To do so we must prevent inflation. Here is an opponent of so many guises that it is sometimes difficult to recognize. But our clear need is to stop continuous and general price rises—a need that all of us can see and feel.

To prevent steadily rising costs and prices calls for stern self-discipline by every citizen. No person, city, State, or organized group can afford to evade the obligation to resist inflation, for every single American pays its crippling tax.

Inflation's ravages do not end at the water's edge. Increases in prices of the goods we sell abroad threaten to drive us out of markets that once were securely ours. Whether domestic prices, so high as to be noncompetitive, result from demands for too-high profit margins or from increased labor costs that outrun growth in productivity, the final result is seriously damaging to the Nation.

We must fight inflation as we would a fire that imperils our home. Only by so doing can we prevent it from destroying our salaries, savings, pensions, and insurance, and from gnawing away the very roots of a free, healthy economy and the Nation's security.

One major method by which the Federal Government can counter inflation and rising prices is to insure that its expenditures are below its revenues. [Applause.] The debt with which we are now confronted is about $290 billion. With interest charges alone now costing taxpayers about $9½ billion, it is clear that this debt growth must stop. You will be glad to know that despite the unsettling influences of the recent steel strike, we estimate that our accounts will show, on June 30, this year, a favorable balance of approximately $200 million. [Applause.]

I shall present to the Congress for 1961 a balanced budget. [Applause.] In the area of defense, expenditures continue at the record peacetime levels of the last several years. With a single exception, expenditures in every major category of health, education, and welfare will be equal to or greater than last year. In space expenditures the amounts are practically doubled. But the overall guiding goal of this budget is national need—not response to specific group, local, or political insistence.

Expenditure increases, other than those I have indicated, are largely accounted for by the increased cost of legislation previously enacted.

I repeat, this budget will be a balanced one. Expenditures will be $79,800 million. The amount of income over outgo described in the budget as a surplus to be applied against our national debt is $4,200 million. [Applause.]

Personally I do not feel that any amount can be properly called a surplus as long as the Nation is in debt; I prefer to think of such an item as a reduction of our children's inherited mortgage. [Applause.] And once we have established such payments as normal practices we can profitably make improvements in our tax structure and thereby truly reduce the heavy burdens of taxation. [Applause.] In any event this one reduction will save taxpayers each year approximately $200 million in interest costs.

This favorable balance will help ease pressures in our credit and capital markets. It will enhance the confidence of people all over the world in the strength of our economy and our currency and in our individual and collective ability to be fiscally responsible.

In the management of the huge public debt the Treasury is unfortunately not free of artificial barriers. Its ability to deal with the difficult problems in this field has been weakened greatly by the unwillingness of the Congress to remove archaic restrictions. The need for a freer hand in debt management is even more urgent today because the costs of the undesirable financing practices which the Treasury has been forced into are mounting. Removal of this roadblock has high priority in my legislative recommendations. [Applause.]

Still another issue relates to civil rights measures.

In all our hopes and plans for a better world we all recognize that provincial and racial prejudices must be combated. In the long perspective of history, the right to vote has been one of the strongest pillars of a free society. Our first duty is to protect this right against all encroachment. In spite of constitutional guarantees, and notwithstanding much progress of recent years, bias still deprives some persons in this country of equal protection of the laws.

Early in your last session, I recommended legislation which would help eliminate several practices discriminating against the basic rights of Americans. The Civil Rights Commission has developed additional constructive recommendations. I hope that these will be among the matters to be seriously considered in the current session. I trust that Congress will thus signal to the world that our Government is striving for equality under law for all our people. [Applause.]

Each year and in many ways our Nation continues to undergo profound change and growth.

In the past 18 months, we have hailed the entry of two more States of the Union—Alaska and Hawaii. We salute these two western stars.

Our vigorous expansion, which we all welcome as a sign of health and vitality, is many sided. We are, for example, witnessing explosive growth in metropolitan areas.

By 1975 the metropolitan areas of the United States will occupy twice the territory they do today. The roster of urban problems with which they must cope is staggering. They involve water supply, cleaning the air, adjusting local tax systems, providing for essential educational, cultural, and social services, and destroying those conditions which breed delinquency and crime.

In meeting these, we must, if we value our historic freedoms, keep within the traditional framework of our Federal system with powers divided between the National and State Governments. The uniqueness of this system may confound the casual observer, but it has worked effectively for nearly 200 years.

I do not doubt that our urban and other perplexing problems can be solved in the traditional American method. In doing so we must realize that nothing is really solved, indeed ruinous tendencies are set in motion by yielding to the deceptive bait of the "easy" Federal tax dollar. [Applause.]

Our educational system provides a ready example. All recognize the vital necessity of having modern school plants, well-qualified and adequately compensated teachers, and of using the best possible teaching techniques and curriculums.

We cannot be complacent about educating our youth.

But the route to better trained minds is not through the swift administration of a Federal hypodermic or sustained financial transfusion. The educational process, essentially a local and personal responsibility, cannot be made to leap ahead by crash, centralized governmental action. [Applause.]

The administration has proposed a carefully reasoned program for helping eliminate current deficiencies. It is designed to stimulate classroom construction, not by substitution of Federal dollars for State and local funds, but by incentives to extend and encourage State and local efforts. This approach rejects the notion of Federal domination or control. It is workable, and should appeal to every American interested in advancement of our educational system in the traditional American way. [Applause.] I urge the Congress to take action upon it.

There is one other subject concerning which I renew a recommendation I made in my state of the Union message last January. I then advised the Congress of my purpose to intensify our efforts to replace force with a rule of law among nations. From many discussions abroad, I am convinced that purpose is widely and deeply shared by other peoples and nations of the world.

In the same message, I stated that our efforts would include a reexamination of our own relation to the International Court of Justice. The Court was established by the United Nations to decide international legal disputes between nations. In 1946 we accepted the Court's jurisdiction, but subject to a reservation of the right to determine unilaterally whether a matter lies essentially within domestic jurisdiction. There is pending before the Senate, a resolution which would repeal our present self-judging reservation. I support that resolution and urge its prompt passage. [Applause.] If this is done, I intend to urge similar acceptance of the Court's jurisdiction by every member of the United Nations.

Here perhaps it is not amiss for me to say a personal word to the Members of the Congress, in this my final year of office, a word about the institutions we respectively represent and the meaning which the relationships between our two branches has for the days ahead.

I am not unique as a President in having worked with a Congress controlled by the opposition party—except that no other President ever did it for quite so long. [Applause.] Yet in both personal and official relationships we have weathered the storms of the past 5 years. For this I am deeply grateful.

My deep concern in the next 12 months, before my successor takes office, is with our joint congressional-executive duty to our own and to other nations. Acting upon the beliefs I have expressed here today, I shall devote my full energies to the tasks at hand, whether these involve travel for promoting greater world understanding, negotiations to reduce international discord, or constant discussions and communications with the Congress and the American people on issues both domestic and foreign.

In pursuit of these objectives, I look forward to, and shall dedicate myself to, a close and constructive association with the Congress.

Every minute spent in irrelevant interbranch wrangling is precious time taken from the intelligent initiation and adoption of coherent policies for our national survival and progress.

We seek a common goal—brighter opportunity for our own citizens and a world peace with justice for all.

Before us and our friends is the challenge of an ideology which, for more than four decades, has trumpeted abroad its purpose of gaining ultimate victory over all forms of government at variance with its own.

We realize that however much we repudiate the tenets of imperialistic communism, it represents a gigantic enterprise. Its leaders compel its subjects to subordinate their freedom of action and spirit and personal desires for some hoped for advantage in the future.

The Communists can present an array of material accomplishments over the past 15 years that lends a false persuasiveness to many of their glittering promises to the uncommitted peoples.

The competition they provide is formidable. We so recognize it. [Applause.]

But in our scale of values we place freedom first. Our whole national existence and development have been geared to that basic concept and is responsible for the position of free world leadership to which we have succeeded.

It is the highest prize that any nation can possess; it is one that communism can never offer. And America's record of material accomplishment in freedom is written not only in the unparalleled prosperity of our own Nation, but in the many billions we have devoted to the reconstruction of free world economies wrecked by World War II and in the effective help of many more billions we have given in saving the independence of many others threatened by outside domination.

Assuredly we have the capacity for handling the problems in the new era of the world's history we are now entering.

But we must use that capacity intelligently and tirelessly, regardless of personal sacrifice.

The fissure that divides our political planet is deep and wide.

We live, moreover, in a storm of semantic disorder in which old labels no longer faithfully describe.

Police states are called "people's democracies."

Armed conquest of free people is called "liberation."

Such slippery slogans make difficult the problem of communicating true faith, facts, and beliefs.

We must make clear our peaceful intentions, our aspirations for a better world. To do so, we must use language to enlighten the mind, not as the instrument of the studied innuendo and distorter of truth.

And we must live by what we say.

On my recent visit to distant lands I found one statesman after another eager to tell me of the elements of their government that had been borrowed from our American Constitution, and from the indestructible ideals set forth in our Declaration of Independence.

As a Nation we take pride that our own constitutional system, and the ideals which sustain it, have been long viewed as a fountainhead of freedom.

By our every word and action we must strive to make ourselves worthy of this trust, ever mindful that an accumulation of seemingly minor encroachments upon freedom gradually could break down the entire fabric of a free society.

So persuaded, we shall get on with the task before us.

So dedicated, and with faith in the Almighty, humanity shall one day achieve the unity in freedom to which all men have aspired from the dawn of time. [Applause, the Members rising.]

THE LATE RICHARD M. SIMPSON

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FENTON].

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, my heart is heavy in confirming what most of you already know, and that is the passing of our distinguished friend and colleague, the Honorable RICHARD M. SIMPSON.

While we have known that DICK SIMPSON has been precariously ill it has been our constant and fervent prayer that his normal health would be regained and he would be returned to this House which he loved so well and which he served in a manner that brought credit to himself and his country.

Death is a shock at any time but it is doubly so when it comes to someone so close to you.

A tall, rugged, dark-haired man of Scotch-Irish ancestry, DICK SIMPSON's roots were dug deep in the central Pennsylvania soil on which his forebears settled shortly after the Revolutionary War. His paternal grandfather, J. Randolph Simpson, who was wounded in the Battle of Antietam while fighting with the 125th Pennsylvania Volunteers, founded the family's insurance business interests in Huntingdon, which DICK himself ran until he turned them over to his younger brothers so that he could concentrate on bringing good government to Washington.

RICHARD MURRAY SIMPSON was born a "century baby" on August 30, 1900, the first son of Warren B. and Sue M. Simpson, in the central Pennsylvania town of Huntingdon. As a boy, he used to "walk the pole lines" to discover downed wires or other reasons for power failures in electric service furnished by Warren Simpson's Raystown Water Power Co., a business the father founded in 1914 by damming the Raystown Branch of the Juniata River.

Whenever a customer in Huntingdon, Mount Union, and several surrounding smaller towns reported the failure, DICK and a younger brother named Ted would begin at opposite ends of the 8-mile-long powerline and walk toward each other until one of them either discovered a wire that had been downed by weather or other conditions or they met without success midway along the route. When that happened, there was nothing to do but start all over again.

DICK's early schooling was in the Huntingdon grammar schools and at Huntingdon High, from which he graduated in 1918, at the age of 18, to enter the Army as a World War I soldier in the Tank Corps. His Army service was at Raleigh, N.C., and the war had ended before his tank unit had completed training for shipment overseas.

Returning to Huntingdon, DICK worked for the power company and did odd jobs around the J. R. and W. B. Simpson Insurance Co. for several months before entering the University of Pittsburgh in 1919. There his size and speed made him a natural for football, and he played first-string left tackle for Pop Warner's great Pitt teams of 1919 through 1922.

Following his graduation, DICK again returned to Huntingdon to go to work in his father's business. From the start, his father—with the memory of his own terms in the house of representatives at Harrisburg and his ambition to run for Congress fresh in his mind—began to talk a political career for his oldest boy. That and a law school degree for DICK were his fondest hopes; and, though it took many years, he lived to see the fulfillment of both.

It took 10 years, for example, for DICK to actually get around to running for political office—and even when he first ran, he lost a Republican primary fight for nomination to the State assembly in 1933. Two years later he ran again, was elected, and served two terms in Harrisburg before being elected to the 75th Congress in a special election on May 11, 1937. He has been in Congress ever since.

When he came to Congress DICK learned that the Ways and Means Committee to which he was assigned concerned itself primarily with law. At once, he took immediate action which has been typical of his congressional service ever since. In the fall of 1937, he began to study law at Georgetown at night, earning his degree in 1942, 4 years later.

In addition to being the ranking Republican on the Ways and Means Committee, DICK earned a congressional reputation for himself as an expert in tax matters, social security legislation, reciprocal trade agreements, and the tariff.

DICK was vice chairman of the Republican conference of the House, secretary and member of the Republican policy committee of the House, secretary and member of the Republican committee on committees in the House, and chairman of the National Republican Congressional Campaign Committee. His district, the Pennsylvania 18th, represents 8 south-central Pennsylvania counties, with a population of more than 360,000 people.

DICK's first wife, the former Grace Metz, died on March 6, 1945, leaving two daughters, Susan and Barbara. On June 12, 1948, DICK married the former Mrs. Mae J. Cox, of Seattle, Wash., a widow with three sons, James, Edward, and Joseph. A daughter, Kay Josephine, was born to the Simpson-Cox union. The family resides at 5205 Lawn Way, Kenwood, Md.

DICK SIMPSON's appointment to the most important congressional election job, in the province of his Republican colleagues to bestow, came as no surprise to those who have known and worked with "DICK SIMPSON of Pennsylvania," as he was known to his colleagues both in and out of the House of Representatives.

As a longtime member of the joint Senate-House conference committees on various tax and other legislation, DICK was invaluable to his party, his district, and his Nation.

Congressman RICHARD M. SIMPSON held the love and respect of every Member of this House, be he friend or foe.

DICK was the type of citizen who is so greatly needed in our country today. A real American, and having worked his way up through life, he was a living example of what can be accomplished by hard work and individual initiative.

There never was a finer exponent of the free enterprise system that has made the United States the greatest country of all. DICK SIMPSON's belief in his fellow man, his strong character, and his will to assist all, endeared him to men and women in all walks of life.

The greatest fault and personal handicap of some public leaders is that they lack the courage of their convictions. But this above all could not be said of DICK SIMPSON for he knew there is no "middle of the road," there is only the right or wrong side. DICK SIMPSON always tried to be on the right side. He was a courageous and conscientious crusader in behalf of his community, his State, and his Nation.

DICK SIMPSON's achievements and success were his own. I feel from my close association with him in recent years, that he found much self-satisfaction in a job well done. In his spoken sentiments you could find the touch of something softly spoken, but where forcefulness and aggressive convictions were needed, he operated with great effectiveness. Never was DICK SIMPSON guilty of quiet acquiescence to a wrong—one of the greatest tributes that can be paid to any man.

For years to come DICK SIMPSON's death will be keenly felt in many places, areas which he loved, and which loved him. The Nation has lost an outstanding leader and we have lost a sterling friend.

The heartfelt sympathy of myself and my family, together with that of our Pennsylvania congressional delegation, as well as DICK's countless friends in all walks of life, go out to his beloved family in their great sorrow.

My fervent prayer is that God will strengthen his good wife and his loved ones to carry on in the days ahead and to help keep the Simpson name the fine symbol of Americanism that it has stood for, in so many years of life and progress in our State and Nation.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VAN ZANDT].

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, the death of my good friend and colleague, DICK SIMPSON, affects me deeply.

DICK, as he has been known to his countless friends, was born and reared not too many miles from my hometown of Altoona, Pa., and for years we have represented adjoining congressional districts. I learned to know DICK SIMPSON during his high-school and college days, and followed his athletic career at the University of Pittsburgh, where he played tackle on the football team under the famous coach "Pop" Warner.

After graduation in 1923, he entered the business field, and at the time of his election to the Pennsylvania State Assembly, in 1935, he was engaged in the insurance and bonding business. Later, upon the death of Representative Benjamin K. Focht, DICK was elected to the House of Representatives, where he has served continuously since the 75th Congress. During his congressional career, DICK found time to study law at Georgetown University, where he received his law degree in 1942.

As a Member of the House of Representatives, DICK established himself as an outstanding legislator giving his time and efforts at all times in discharging his duties on the national scene. He also endeared himself to the membership of the House which earned him the title as a real friend of all his colleagues. To DICK's credit today there are many laws on the statute books in which he played a major part in their enactment. These laws touch many fields of government and are of great benefit to the American people as a whole. They stand as a monument to his efforts as a State and National legislator.

In addition to all the time and effort that DICK applied to his responsibilities as a Member of the House of Representatives he gave freely of his energy in support of the two-party system that is one of the pillars of our form of government. Being a Republican he naturally contributed in many ways to his party, but especially was his outstanding leadership felt by his chairmanship of the Republican congressional committee. His duties in this capacity caused him to travel nationwide as he gave to all of us in the House who are Republicans his encouragement and advice in our political campaigns.

It can be truly said that many of us on the Republican side of the House owe our presence here in a large measure to the interest DICK SIMPSON took in our election campaigns.

Among DICK SIMPSON's many fine attributes is the great love he had for his home and family. As busy as he was, DICK gave to his good wife Mae and the children the devotion of a real father, and they returned his love in equal measure. The passing of DICK SIMPSON while denying his wife and children his companionship has left them a precious legacy of a useful and active life which will be a benediction to them as they reflect on his memory as a husband and father. To his wife Mae and children and to his brothers and sisters, I express my sincere sympathy in the great loss they have sustained. May God grant my good friend DICK SIMPSON eternal rest.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK].

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, it is with a truly heavy heart that I arise today and attempt to express, with mere words, my sorrow at the death of a longtime and valued friend, RICHARD SIMPSON.

As I look over events of his life, I am struck with the similarity of many to those of my own life.

There was a difference of only a few days in our ages.

We both studied law, both came to the Congress as a result of special elections, and both served as chairman of the Republican congressional committee.

My friendship with DICK SIMPSON dates back to his first campaign days, when it was my pleasure to speak on behalf of his candidacy at a meeting in his hometown of Huntingdon, Pa.

I was impressed from the start with DICK's great vigor, his stalwart refusal to compromise political principles for expediency, and the eloquence with which he put forth his convictions.

However, it is not my purpose at this time to enumerate the virtues or the talents of our departed colleague. DICK SIMPSON, because of his qualities of leadership, was well enough known to the Members of this House so that no such recital is needed from me.

But I do want to say that the fine contributions he made to his district, his party, and his country justified completely my early evaluation of DICK SIMPSON as a potentially outstanding public servant.

I am sure I voice the sentiments of many others here today when I say that for me the loss of DICK SIMPSON is one of those tragedies I simply find difficult to believe.

It is particularly hard to believe because in my mind I always have associated DICK SIMPSON with strength: physical strength; strength of character; strength of purpose. But his death is another reminder to us of man's mortality and that mercifully, perhaps, no one knows who next among us may be called, or when.

Meanwhile, it is our duty to go about our appointed tasks, taking such consolation as we can in the knowledge that great friends such as DICK SIMPSON served their Nation well and that all of us are better for having known their friendship.

To Mrs. Simpson and the family, I offer my heartfelt sympathies in their untimely bereavement.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MILLS].

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, it is with great sadness that I rise to pay respects to our departed friend and colleague, RICHARD M. SIMPSON. As a result of learning this morning of the passing of my close friend, the admired and respected ranking minority member of the Committee on Ways and Means and our beloved colleague, I am deeply grieved.

We were greatly disturbed when we received word that he had undergone, very suddenly, a serious operation. We devoutly hoped that he would again be at our side when this Congress convened yesterday and we were greatly shocked when we later received some indication of the deep seriousness of his sudden illness. It is difficult for me today to express the depth of my feeling on the loss of my friend.

DICK SIMPSON served his district and his Nation for many years with honor and great distinction. His influence, and the warmth of his friendship, however, extended far beyond the borders of his congressional district.

I had the privilege of working closely with DICK SIMPSON over a period of many years on the Committee on Ways and Means. I came to know him as only true friends can know one another. We reposed great confidence in each other. I do not hesitate to say that I trusted DICK SIMPSON completely and my trust was never misplaced. He was a man of his word, utterly and completely. The depth of his integrity and his sincerity was well known to all of his friends, not only on the Committee on Ways and Means and in the House of Representatives, but across the breadth of the Nation.

The Committee on Ways and Means, the Congress, the Nation, have suffered a great loss in the death of DICK SIMPSON. His warm hand of friendship will be sorely missed. His brilliant mind, so quick to grasp the issue, so capable in developing a solution, will be sorely missed. The strength with which he fought for those principles in which he believed constituted a part of his character acknowledged by all with whom he came into contact. Any difference in our views on issues on occasion never exerted any influence on our close personal friendship.

To his dear wife and children, and to his brothers and sisters, I extend my deep, heartfelt sympathy. Perhaps they can take some measure of solace in knowing that DICK left not only a monument of public service to his Nation, but also a warmth of friendship which will be sorely missed by all who were privileged to enjoy it.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, words do not flow easily when I rise to pay tribute to one of my oldest and closest friends. While his death was not unexpected—we all knew for several days how dangerous his condition was—we all hoped that through some miracle he might live. Fate decided otherwise.

To know DICK SIMPSON was to love him. He was a man of the highest character. He possessed a brilliant mind and he was as honest as the day is long. DICK SIMPSON never went back on his word or on a friend in his life. It was these fine virtues that bound him to his friends with a grip of steel.

As a member of the Ways and Means Committee he was a resourceful fighter for American industries. Born in the great State of Pennsylvania, he knew the value of industry in providing jobs for the working people, and he was ever a champion of legislation that would keep them strong and vigorous.

Possessing great organizational ability, he was drafted to be chairman of the Republican congressional campaign committee. DICK entered into the work with enthusiasm because he believed thoroughly in his party and his heart was in his work. Possessed of great physical strength, he carried both burdens, as well as his own district and congressional work, with minute attention. He loved to work for causes he believed in, and the hours he devoted to his work were endless.

In recent months his task was not an easy one, but DICK bore his burdens without complaint. He fought for what he believed was right even if forced to battle alone. Only in recent weeks it was noticed he was being affected by his work, and he was urged to take a little vacation, but DICK would not quit. He insisted on making a campaign trip to California when it was obvious he should be under check in a hospital.

Today one of our ablest and one of our most beloved Members is dead, and we indeed are sad at his untimely death. He died for his country just as surely as if he fell on the field of battle.

DICK SIMPSON was devoted to his work to the very end.

I recall as if it were yesterday when DICK first came here and from then our friendship started. I had known him in the campaign and was helpful in bringing about his election as chairman of the congressional campaign committee. So, having been privileged to enjoy his friendship from the very first instance, I learned quickly what a great character he possessed. That friendship became stronger as the days passed.

To his sweet and devoted wife, Mae, as well as to all members of his family, I extend my deepest sympathy, and I share their great grief. A great American has been called to immortality. This world is richer and better for his having lived. His work will never be forgotten. He will always be remembered by his constituents and by his many associates in his work. He believed in America, and to build a better country he gave his life. So today I join with you in expressing my sincere sympathy to the members of his family and bidding a fond farewell to a dead comrade.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAGUE].

Mr. DAGUE. Mr. Speaker, this Congress and the Nation has suffered an irreparable loss in the tragic passing of our esteemed and distinguished colleague, the Honorable RICHARD M. SIMPSON, and we stand bereft of one of the ablest and most dedicated Members this House has ever had. In addition we who counted ourselves among his closest friends are heartbroken as we contemplate this going away of one who was constant in his concern for the welfare of others and whose unfailing availability for service to his colleagues on both sides of the aisle was one of the brighter experiences of this congressional assignment.

As man steps back into the wings of this life's stage a Higher Power comes into view and it is in a firm reliance on the Master's promise that we are reassured as our beloved friend crosses to the other shore. We cannot fathom the inscrutable ways of the Almighty but we are comforted by His promise that we shall be reunited with those whom we have loved and lost for awhile.

The one whose going away we mourn was a stalwart citizen and a great friend to have by one's side when the going became rough. We shall never forget his many kindnesses and we know that the great host of his friends will keep his memory forever green.

To his beloved wife and children goes our deepest sympathy and we shall be diligent for their continued welfare as we know our departed colleague would have been for our loved ones had we been in his place. Theirs is the consolation that comes from the knowledge that the one departed served his country with honor and distinction in both peace and war and that in every time and circumstance he reposed an unwavering faith in his God. It is now to that all-merciful Father that we commend his spirit and it is to His care that we commend all those who remain to mourn.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield now to the dean of the Pennsylvania delegation [Mr. WALTER].

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, the news of the death of DICK SIMPSON cast a cloud of gloom over the entire State of Pennsylvania. It will be a long while in lifting.

DICK SIMPSON was known and respected by thousands of Pennsylvanians because of his human character, his honesty and his stanch and abiding belief in the institutions of our beloved Republic. All of us are going to miss DICK's words in debate. Whether we agreed with him or not, we were certain that he enunciated a policy that he believed in and that he sincerely thought was in the best interests of America. The State of Pennsylvania has lost a great son. The Union has lost a wise and experienced statesman. We of the House have lost a beloved friend.

To the members of his family I extend my deepest and heartfelt sympathy.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARENDS].

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, ofttimes it is said that "words are empty." How true that may be on occasion. Today I feel sure that this entire House membership feels an extraordinary loss in the passing of DICK SIMPSON. Words uttered here today come from the heart of all of us on this sad occasion, yet mine seem so empty in trying to convey my feeling of emptiness itself.

DICK SIMPSON was a man. I mean it the way it is stated. He was a man in the fullest sense of the word. He was strong, rugged; a man of principle and convictions on which he was always ready to stand. He plotted his course, and he had the courage to follow the chart. For this we all have admired and respected him. Truly, I repeat, here was a man.

I feel privileged to have been able to have DICK SIMPSON as my personal friend, and for whom I had great affection, respect, and admiration. There is no way, no words to express the loss his passing is to his district that he so ably represented, a great loss to the State of Pennsylvania, and certainly to the Nation. As a true American, he battled for those principles that he believed were good for America. His own personal interests came last. The Republican Party, as well as this great legislative body, have lost a real stalwart from our ranks. As time goes on, our loss will be increasingly emphasized, and we will miss him more and more. May the good Lord bring comfort to his fine wife, Mae, and to all his family. Goodby, DICK. You may be gone from us physically, but you will be with us always in our minds and hearts and what you have meant to all of us is a pattern you have set for gracious living, constructive thinking, and hard work from which we will strive never to deviate.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. FORAND].

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Speaker, the untimely passing of our distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania, the Honorable RICHARD SIMPSON, leaves us sad and depressed. We will miss him.

DICK was a kind man. He was a hard worker and a real fighter for fairness and justice. He was a most able and efficient public servant and during his long service as a Member of this House he left an imprint that will not soon be forgotten.

As a fellow member of the Ways and Means Committee I got to know DICK intimately. To know him was a privilege and to count him as a friend is a cherished possession.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, this world is better because DICK SIMPSON lived. To his devoted wife and family Mrs. Forand and I extend our sincere sympathy and we pray the Lord that DICK will rest in peace and that those who are dear to him may have strength to bear their great loss.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON].

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, DICK SIMPSON came to this Congress in the same year that I came, 23 years ago. During those 23 years DICK and I were close personal friends; not only close personal friends, but we believed in and we stood for practically the same program. Of course, I was shocked and dismayed when I learned of his serious illness and his death.

Because I cannot find words to properly express my feelings on this occasion, I shall have to depend upon the words of an unknown poet who expressed so beautifully the consolation and the assurance of immortality that we all need on occasions of this kind. The poem is entitled "There Is No Death":

There is no death! The stars go down
To rise upon some other shore,
And bright in heaven's jeweled crown
They shine for evermore.

There is no death! The dust we tread
Shall change beneath the summer showers
To golden grain or mellow fruit
Or rainbow-tinted flowers.

There is no death! Although we grieve
When beautiful familiar forms
That we have learned to love
Are torn from our embracing arms,

Although with bowed and breaking hearts,
With sable guard and silent tread,
We bear their senseless dust to earth
And say that they are dead.

They are not dead! They have but passed
Beyond the mists that blind us here,
Into the new and larger life
Of that serener sphere.

Tho' disenthralled and glorified,
They still are here, and love us yet;
The dear ones they have left behind
They never can forget.

DICK SIMPSON was a man. Whence comes such another?

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOGGS].

Mr. BOGGS. Mr. Speaker, in a very short time our Committee on Ways and Means has lost some of its stalwart members. In the past few months we have lost Dan Reed, Tom Jenkins, "Eb" Eberharter, Jere Cooper, and now Dick Simpson.

It has been very difficult for me to believe that DICK has left us, because he was a man one never associated with sickness. He was always active and buoyant and happy. He lived a busy life but he had time for the many friendships that he built as he went along.

As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] has said; as Speaker MARTIN has said; as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTER] has said, he was a fighter from the word go. He was a partisan in the best sense of the word, a partisan from principle. And yet there was never anything petty or bitter or mean or little or vindictive about him.

I know that in my own experiences with him which spread over a decade, whenever I had a matter before my Committee on Ways and Means and DICK SIMPSON was on my side I knew that the chance for enactment was good because he brought to any cause tremendous ability, a fine knowledge and a sense of responsibility and dedication. I knew also that if he were on the other side the chance for passage was much dimmer.

He was a warm, warm friend. I had the good fortune of living close to DICK, in our respective residences here in Washington; and I used to see a good bit of him during the off hours, so to speak. He was always relaxed and pleasant.

Sometimes in the heat of the battle, when he had taken a position which may have been contrary to mine, or when I had taken a position contrary to his, both of us always, somehow or another, wanted to try to make it up to the other.

So, Mr. Speaker, I have a sense of great personal loss today. The only consolation I have is that I think this man leaves the greatest heritage that a man can leave, that of a good name, that of having served his party, his Nation, and his family, with honor and integrity. I shall miss him; all of us shall.

To his lovely wife, Mae, and his fine family Mrs. Boggs and I express our deepest sympathy.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentlemen from Pennsylvania [Mr. GAVIN].

Mr. GAVIN. Mr Speaker, it was with profound sadness I learned of the passing of my very good and able friend DICK SIMPSON. We have lost an able colleague and a very good friend. It is a great loss to our State and to the Congress. To those of us who have been been close to him and known him well and had shared his friendship, his death carries with it a sense of deep and personal loss.

He was the dean of our Pennsylvania delegation, one of the senior Republican Members of the House of Representatives. His work, as one of the ranking members of the Ways and Means Committee, was recognized as outstanding.

He was a man who had dedicated his life to the service of his State and Nation. His genius in politics was a genius of a leader; a firm determination and indomitable courage, and tireless toil inspired trust and confidence.

He was a hard, conscientious worker. A man who was greatly admired and respected by all who knew him and by all who were associated with him.

On all problems he responded with a willingness to be helpful in any way that he could.

He had an abiding faith in the principles and ideals of our Government. In all things it can be said he was a great citizen and a great American, and his one ambition was to hand on to posterity and the generations of tomorrow, a greater American than was handed on to him.

So today it is with a feeling of deep sadness we record his passing and we will remember him for the many little acts of kindness that manifested his friendship and good will toward the Members of this House.

He will be greatly missed by the people of his congressional district and the State of Pennsylvania that he so ably represented.

I extend my sincere and deepest sympathy to his wife and family.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BYRNES].

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, words and phrases that come to mind at a time like this are certainly most inadequate to express what is in our hearts. In fact, many of the sentiments and the words that we feel we might utter seem extremely trite. The temptation is almost such as to make one hesitate to speak because of the inadequacy of putting into words one's feelings. But, from my first days in the House of Representatives, I worked intimately with DICK SIMPSON. He was an adviser to me always and a consistent friend. I think all of us found him to be always friendly and considerate, always willing to go out of his way, no matter how busy he might be or how small or trivial our problems might be, to assist us. He was a man, certainly, of firm convictions and principles. Of all the people I have known, I do not think there is anyone whom I would place above DICK SIMPSON in his strong faith in the American political and economic system and his dedication to the preservation of those institutions. DICK really dedicated his life to the service of his people, his country and as well to the service of his colleagues as he did serve so many of us so diligently, and to the service of his party. It is trite to say that we all will miss him. It goes deeper than that, but frankly, Mr. Speaker, I am incapable of putting that feeling into words. Permit me to say that Mrs. Byrnes joins with me in expressing our most profound and deepest sympathy to his wife, Mae, to his children and to his brothers and sisters.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SAYLOR].

Mr. SAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, although I have had several days to resign myself to what doctors agreed was inevitable, the news of DICK SIMPSON'S death this morning came as a profound shock. The loss of a national leader always has a sobering effect upon the whole populace; when a close personal friend is involved the wound penetrates deeper into the heart.

I knew DICK SIMPSON by reputation long before I ever had the pleasure of meeting him. He was a rugged University of Pittsburgh lineman who helped make the Panthers a national football power in the early 1920's. Back in western and central Pennsylvania, the players on Pitt's football clubs are familiar to grownups and kids alike, and DICK SIMPSON was a hero from little Washington to Erie and from the Ohio line right into Penn State and University of Pennsylvania territory.

When RICHARD M. SIMPSON, then a successful businessman, was elected to Congress in 1937, I was happy for my State. I liked his looks. I liked what he said. As in the case of the voters of his district, I recognized him as a man of character, of courage, of fair play—a man of his word.

DICK SIMPSON substantiated this judgment from his first year in the House. By the time I became a colleague, he had long been established as a tower of strength in the defense of American principle and integrity. To join the State delegation in which he was so active was a distinct honor, and to have the opportunity to associate with him as a friend was a great satisfaction and pleasure.

In this association I found DICK SIMPSON ever increasing in stature. He was fearless, unyielding, and forthright. He was also a warm and considerate person who willingly devoted his life to his fellow man without thought of compensation or credit for his contributions. At Pitt he had been satisfied to stay down in front where the biggest battles were taking place but where comparatively little notice is received. Here in Washington, he served in a similar capacity: always exerting every ounce of energy to assure the Nation of the highest type government and the most equitable laws, yet ignoring opportunities for the personal recognition which he earned and deserved.

DICK SIMPSON was a monument to good government—a solid, immovable man of integrity to whom students of politics of this generation and for every generation hereafter may look for inspiration and for a quickening of their dedication to the flag and the Constitution.

I extend my sympathies to Mrs. Simpson and to their children. They were a happy couple, a God-fearing family that everyone would enjoy as a neighbor. It was my good fortune to have this learned, humble, devout citizen and statesman as my neighbor in Congress. The memory of this rich experience, will, I hope, serve as consolation in the years to come for the great personal loss that has come today with the passing of this fine and fast friend.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. IKARD].

Mr. IKARD. Mr. Speaker, we have all been saddened here today by the feeling of personal loss in the passing of a friend. DICK SIMPSON, in his personal life as well as in his public life, conducted himself and his work and efforts in such a way that his fine mind, his unquestioned integrity and his devotion to his country were clearly evident to all of us who were privileged to know him and to work with him. As has been indicated, there is little that we can say or do here that would correctly express the feeling that is in our hearts or in any way describe the real greatness of this man. I think our inadequacies, however, are softened by the knowledge and by knowing that the principles that DICK SIMPSON stood for will live for a long time and endure as a monument to men such as he. I am one of those who was privileged to serve on the Committee on Ways and Means with DICK SIMPSON and to come to know him well. I shall miss him. I extend to his family my heartfelt sympathy.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, Ohio joins with Pennsylvania and with the Nation in grieving over the passing of our great friend, RICHARD M. SIMPSON. I, too, feel a personal loss.

For 21 years or more DICK SIMPSON and I were close friends. We served for a time on the same committee in the House. We had adjoining offices on the same floor in the House Office Building. We served together on the Committee on Committees. I was in touch with him or with his good wife during his illness. He carried throughout these days great interest in what was going on in Washington and in our national political life.

RICHARD M. SIMPSON was a man of great ability, but of even greater character. He was a sincere and honorable man, who had the courage of his convictions. He never failed to fight the good fight for the principles in which he believed and in the best interest of the country he loved.

I join in extending sympathy to his beloved wife, to his children and to his brothers. He has left to them the priceless heritage of a good name, and he has left his many friends, including those of us here in the House, many precious memories of his friendship and of his outstanding public services over the years.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, it was with profound regret that I learned of the untimely death this morning of my dear friend and longtime colleague, RICHARD SIMPSON.

I experience a personal loss in the death of DICK, as he was fondly known to all of us. He was more than a colleague from our State of Pennsylvania. I knew him through the years of our service in the Congress as a sincere friend and gentleman, who, although on the opposite side of the aisle, was always ready to cooperate whenever he thought the case was just or whenever the action would be of benefit to our country and State.

DICK represented with great and conscientious ability a district in western Pennsylvania which adjoined mine. We had many problems of mutual interest and it was good to discuss with him matters and exchange ideas on legislation designed to benefit our constituencies.

DICK was first elected to Congress in 1937. He was loved by the people of his district who respected his ability. This was evidenced by the great popularity he enjoyed.

He was the ranking minority member of the House Ways and Means Committee. He served that committee and this Congress with distinction. He was indeed a great American.

DICK was a good man, a sincere, earnest, able, and hard-working legislator. He will be sorely missed not only by this Congress and our State of Pennsylvania, but by the entire Nation. To his widow and his children who survive him, I extend my deepest sympathy.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HOEVEN].

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, I deeply regret the passing of my very good friend, RICHARD M. SIMPSON. It has been my rare privilege to have been rather closely associated with him in the Congress during the past 17 years.

RICHARD SIMPSON was an extraordinary individual with dynamic energy and perseverance. He fought for the things he deemed right, honorable, and just, both for his constituents and his country.

RICHARD SIMPSON served with honor and distinction as chairman of the Republican congressional committee for many years. In that assignment, he ever stood ready to help his Republican colleagues in their contests for election. He gave freely of his good advice and always demonstrated a great willingness to help them in every way possible. He will be remembered as one of the best chairmen the Republican congressional committee ever had.

RICHARD SIMPSON was an able legislator, and as ranking minority member of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, he clearly displayed his great knowledge of tax and revenue problems. In his passing, the House of Representatives has lost one of its most able and efficient public servants.

This Christian gentleman has gone to his reward. Although we grieve at his passing, we take consolation in the fact that he served well his day and generation. What more can be said of any man? Personally, and in behalf of the Republican conference of the House of Representatives, I extend deepest sympathy to Mrs. Simpson and all members of the family.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KEARNS].

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, this morning at 8:15, when our beloved friend, RICHARD SIMPSON, left us, and when he failed to answer the call of the House today, we were all deeply grieved. However, I know that over the years all of us, when the bells ring calling the House to session, will remember this highly cultured gentleman, this distinguished man, this good Christian, wonderful father and fine husband—this man who truly loved his country.

In speaking my farewell to my good friend, DICK SIMPSON, I would like to recall the words of the Psalmist:

> The earth is the Lord's, and the fullness thereof; the world and they that dwell therein.

Do we all realize that we are merely the stewards of our heritage here?

RICHARD SIMPSON accounted well for his stewardship on earth. His wonderful character and record will be written in the big book.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CORBETT].

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Speaker, I too share the sadness at the departing of my good friend, DICK SIMPSON. Possibly I knew him longer than any Member of the House. I remember him in the happiest times of his life.

He was a student of the University of Pittsburgh in the class of my brother and sister. He was a frequent week-end visitor at our home, which was in suburban Pittsburgh. I was just 5 years younger than DICK. I remember so well cheering his exploits as a member of the football team. As executive secretary of the Allegheny County Young Republicans, I remember going with a group down to campaign in the special election of 1937 and putting on a telephone campaign for him. We cheered when he was elected. We had occasion to cheer for DICK again when he became chairman of the Republican congressional campaign committee, and we had reason to cheer when he entered into a second happy family life.

Knowing DICK for these 39 years, the surest thing that comes to my mind regarding him is that he took the talents that God endowed him with and developed them to their fullest.

It is a tragedy that he would be cut down now when he was reaching full maturity and full capabilities.

So I believe that in paying tribute to this great American perhaps the finest thing we can accomplish in memory of this man who died with his plans unfulfilled is to in some degree—we do not all have the potentiality that DICK had—pay tribute to him by being more dedicated to our duties and more patriotically devoted to our country in imitation of him.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentlewoman from Ohio [Mrs. BOLTON].

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, we all feel deeply the sudden separation from us of a colleague who has meant so much to everyone on both sides of the aisle, for DICK SIMPSON was loved by many and respected by all.

We long to express our deep and understanding sympathy to Mrs. Simpson and his family but words fail when the heart is full.

So I, like NOAH MASON, turn to one of the ancients to find solace. I would remind us all that—

> Never the spirit was born; the spirit shall cease to be never;
> Never was time it was not; end and beginning are dreams;
> Birthless and deathless and changeless remaineth the spirit forever;
> Death hath not touched it at all, dead though the house of it seems.
> Nay, but as one who layeth
> His wornout robes away,
> And taking new ones, sayeth
> "These will I wear today."
> So putteth by the spirit
> Lightly its robes of flesh,
> And passeth to inherit
> A residence afresh.

Our colleague has thrown from his shoulders garments that were probably outworn and gone to larger fields of endeavor, to an even more satisfying service not only to his country but to his God. May the Infinite receive him tenderly and may He comfort those he loved so dearly by the sure knowledge that life is eternal, separation but temporary.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. JENSEN].

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, the Honorable RICHARD SIMPSON was a genuine man. He was genuine in character, genuine in his duties, genuine in his friendships. I can think of no finer tribute to express about this great and good American than to say, as I have just said, that RICHARD SIMPSON was genuine in all his thinking, and in all his doings.

I learned to know DICK SIMPSON; I learned to honor and respect him, in the 21 years I had the honor and the privilege of serving with him in this House of Representatives and also in serving on the congressional campaign committee with him for a period of 6 years. DICK was always fair in his dealings with his political opponents. Never did DICK SIMPSON accuse anyone of doing something which they did not do. He never took undue advantage of his political opponents either in his district or in this House of Representatives. He spoke his mind in a calm, collected manner, weighing his words as he spoke; not an orator but a great convincer, so to speak, to his way of thinking.

My heart goes out to his dear, good wife and family. The Honorable RICHARD SIMPSON of Pennsylvania did not answer the rollcall on yesterday here in the House of Representatives. He answered the rollcall up yonder today. God rest his soul.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLOOD].

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have been most attentive during these ceremonies. And, in the years that I have been privileged to be a Member of the House, it is moments like this which exemplify best those many qualities that so many of us love about this great institution, the House of Representatives. Here on both sides of the aisle, man after man of both great parties, from their manner of speech, from their tone of voice, knowing them as I know the men who have been speaking, those facts in themselves to me have paid a far greater tribute to the memory of our friend, DICK SIMPSON, than the beautiful words that came from their lips and their hearts, honest and true as were these expressions.

Mr. Speaker, I remind my colleagues from Pennsylvania that it is about 2 months ago to the day that DICK SIMPSON went with us to the funeral of our beloved colleague, Al Bush, of Pennsylvania. It was after that that he attended his last public function, when he addressed in my home town the annual dinner of the Pennsylvania Manufacturers Association. DICK sat next to me and said many nice things in his speech about me. During the years that I have seen him here—and I knew him before—I saw him as he came down the aisle from where I now stand, a big man, a strong man.

This man looked like a Congressman and he acted like one. It is fitting and proper that his old friend whom we know as "Doc" FENTON of Pennsylvania comes to the floor today with a heavy heart and joins hands across these aisles with my colleagues in the Democratic Party and in the Republican Party to pay a tribute that we feel so deeply today.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. POFF]

Mr. POFF. Mr. Speaker, as ultimately all of us must do, DICK SIMPSON has joined the innumerable caravan which journeys to the undiscovered country, from whose bourne no traveler returns. But those who loved him and, by intimate association, had the opportunity to plumb the depths of his spiritual convictions take solace in the sure knowledge that his soul abides in eternal bliss.

DICK SIMPSON was more than a Congressman; he was, in the most honorable connotation of the phrase, a Congressman's Congressman. As busy as always were his mind and body, he always had time to accommodate his colleagues, to perform an act of grace or to speak a word of unadorned but unadulterated kindness.

Perhaps the greatest tribute that can be paid any Member of this great legislative body is the one which suits DICK SIMPSON best—he was an American first and a provincial second. While he was always and in all ways devoted to Pennsylvania's 18th Congressional District, his constituents were proud of the fact that his concern and his vision took the broader scope. His character was unblemished with sectional bias and his heart was untainted with the punitive motive; and accordingly, the esteem in which he was held knew no geographic boundaries.

My prayer for his bereaved loved ones is that God may comfort, shelter and hold them in the hollow of His hand.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. CHENOWETH].

Mr. CHENOWETH. Mr. Speaker, I was inexpressibly shocked and saddened today when I learned of the passing of DICK SIMPSON. I knew that he had been critically ill and that his passing was not unexpected. However, I had not given up hope for his recovery.

I wish to join my colleagues from Pennsylvania in paying tribute to our beloved colleague, DICK SIMPSON. He was truly a great American. He was a Member of the House when I first came to this body in 1941, and at that time was recognized as an outstanding Member.

I had great admiration and affection for DICK SIMPSON. He was a real friend. I went to him frequently for advice and counsel. He always had time for a visit and was eager to help. I know he gave liberally of his time to his many friends in the House.

DICK SIMPSON had a most affable personality, and was a man of great personal charm. He made a friend of everyone he met. It was a real privilege to serve with him in Congress, and I shall always treasure happy memories of our association in this body. His passing is a great personal loss to me and he will be sadly missed by everyone who knew him.

DICK and Mrs. Simpson made several trips to Colorado in recent years, and we were always delighted to have them. I know his many friends in Colorado are deeply grieved over his untimely passing.

Mr. Speaker, the passing of DICK SIMPSON is an irreparable loss not alone to his district, and the State of Pennsylvania, but to the entire Nation. Men like DICK SIMPSON cannot be replaced.

Mrs. Chenoweth joins me in extending our deep personal sympathy to Mrs. Simpson, the children, and the other members of the family.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN].

Mr. CURTIN. Mr. Speaker, it is with a heavy heart that I join in this memorial service today for our brilliant colleague and my friend, RICHARD M. SIMPSON.

DICK SIMPSON represented an eight-county district in the southwestern part of Pennsylvania, in itself unusually well diversified. Yet, it could be truly said of him, as of perhaps few others, that he was everyone's Congressman. His reputation and influence extended far beyond the confines of Pennsylvania, and in this fact we find acknowledged the great measure of the man. His tireless efforts in behalf of good government and his unselfish devotion to duty during a lifetime of service made him an outstanding and great American.

DICK SIMPSON served the 18th District of Pennsylvania and his country well, and with distinction for the 23 years that he was in the Congress of the United States. His first concern always was for the best interests of his own people. His distinguished record transcended local interests, and he made his tremendous ability and statesmanship felt on the national level. Likewise, he was a wonderful bulwark of strength for all of us in the Pennsylvania delegation. We valued his wise counsel and humane regard for others.

DICK SIMPSON was also a dedicated family man, completely devoted to his gracious wife and fine children. He was a friend to whom one could refer problems in the confident and sure knowledge that he would reciprocate with full and complete attention.

Of DICK SIMPSON it truly could be said, "The secret of success is constancy of purpose." We shall feel his loss keenly, but can take comfort in the realization that, during his nearly 60 years on this earth, DICK SIMPSON lived a rich and full life, characterized by unselfish service to others.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUIGLEY].

Mr. QUIGLEY. Mr. Speaker, DICK SIMPSON's district and my own are immediately adjacent to each other. Close as we were geographically, however, I am afraid that politically speaking we were quite often many miles apart. Despite the differences in our views on many basic issues I was never blind to the obvious capabilities of the man. He was an intelligent, articulate spokesman for what he honestly believed to be in the best interests of this country.

This Congress as well as his family have suffered a great loss in his untimely passing. Pennsylvania and America have lost a distinguished citizen and a dedicated public servant. In this hour of grief I join my colleagues on both sides of the aisle in extending deepest sympathy to his widow and to the members of his family.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCCULLOCH].

Mr. MCCULLOCH. Mr. Speaker, I am sorrowed by the passing of my longtime friend and colleague, DICK SIMPSON. He was one of my most dependable advisers almost from the first day that I came to the Congress as the result of a special election in 1947, just as DICK had come to the Congress after a special election 10 years before. He continued to be my very good friend and adviser down to the very end.

Principle to DICK SIMPSON was not divisible; and the many principles for which he so courageously fought and saw enacted into law will be lasting monuments to an able, resourceful, and patriotic legislator.

DICK SIMPSON rendered yeoman service to the people of his congressional district, to his State, to his Nation, and to his party. He will be sorely missed by his colleagues and by his innumerable friends everywhere. Mrs. Simpson, his lovely and devoted wife, his children, and his entire family have my deepest sympathy.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLIKEN].

Mr. MILLIKEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to join my colleagues in expressing my sorrow and regret at the passing of DICK SIMPSON and to extend my deepest sympathy to his family. I did not have the privilege of knowing DICK SIMPSON before I came to the Congress, but I was here only a few weeks when I recognized his outstanding ability as one of the leaders of the House of Representatives. It is with a feeling of profound sorrow and regret that I pay this last tribute to DICK SIMPSON, who will be missed by all who knew him. He was one of the men who made America great.

Mr. FELTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to our colleague, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HORAN].

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Speaker, true things have been said here today about our departed brother.

We have lost a colleague who was guided by kindness, and principle and integrity and the justice that comes from inherent honesty and fairness.

I know whereof I speak for I served on the Republican congressional committee with DICK. Sure he wanted his side to win but I can testify that he wanted that victory to be fairly won without any recourse to tactics that lacked truth or dignity.

I know that DICK SIMPSON believed in the value of the two-party system—that the electorate might know both sides—and thus be guided by the best knowledge available. I know he felt that the preservation of this great Republic of ours must be predicated on that.

The tributes paid to DICK here today by Members of the opposite party bear this out—and it is an inspiration to all of us to hear them and realize what they mean.

I, too, join with my colleagues in the extension of profound sympathy to Mrs. Simpson and the family.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FULTON].

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, we are all stunned today by DICK SIMPSON's passing. Many of us have known him as long as we can remember. We of the Pennsylvania delegation on the Republican side as well as the Democratic delegation from Pennsylvania have lost a real leader and a real friend. We have known DICK so long that I almost cannot remember when I did not know him.

As the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CORBETT] has just said, we knew him from the early days. At the time of his first election to Congress I was one of the young Republicans who went to Huntingdon to help him get started on his campaign to come to Congress. It was a personal privilege to attend the wedding of his daughter last summer, a wonderful family occasion with so many friends attending. The first time I ever saw DICK, I believe, was when I was 12 or 13 years old, and we were at the dam on the Raystown Branch of the Juniata River in the Pennsylvania mountains near Huntingdon, DICK's hometown. I knew DICK as one of the older boys that everybody looked up to, when we were youngsters at Camp Myler. When I came to Congress, he continued to be a good friend. We of the Pennsylvania delegation have always looked up to DICK and have admired his leadership in Congress. DICK SIMPSON's career has been a matter of great pride to everybody in Pennsylvania.

I close by saying that regardless of party, there are times when everyone in Congress has a sense of loss in the passing of a Member. Each of us has a very deep sense of loss, and I know that we all remember the good things that DICK has done and the leadership he has provided, not only to the Republicans in this body but all the conscientious Members of this House, during all of these years that he has given such serious and devoted service to our good country and our American people. To Mae and DICK SIMPSON and the family we offer our thanks, evidence our pride, and express to your our friendship at this time of change.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS].

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I mourn with the members of the great Pennsylvania delegation and all the Members of the House and the people of our country, and I may say of the world, because of the passing of DICK SIMPSON, a man of great character, a great legislator, and a great religious leader.

The last time I talked to DICK SIMPSON was shortly after his lovely daughter's wedding. I had hoped to attend until the last moment, but I could not. At that time I spoke to him about an injury I am sure he sustained as he appeared at a political dinner he attended at a Washington hotel and a part of the head table platform on which many were standing collapsed and I felt sure his foot was crushed under the platform. I had a feeling at that time that it was but he never told anybody about it. He finally admitted it. I tell you that to show some of his physical courage. He had great physical courage as well as moral courage. I am positive that he had physical courage during the last weeks of his service. He must have had great doctors to have the operation that he went through, and yet I do not believe he ever complained to anybody.

I am mindful of the fact that we place a very heavy burden upon our colleagues, a burden upon those who are in charge, as legislative leaders, in positions of trust. I was struck with DICK SIMPSON'S loyalty to the United States and his loyalty to the business interests of the manufacturers and the laboring people of his own district and those of the Nation. His wish was to have the United States a free, prosperous, and solvent nation He used his fine ability to work tirelessly for success. Through his integrity much valuable legislation was passed. He was so wonderful in every way. He was never too busy to talk to any of the Members regardless of party. He always gave us wise advice and helped us in whatever way he could.

It must have taken courage for him to be loyal to certain persons to whom he was loyal because there were those who were constantly pushing him the other way.

To his beautiful wife, who was of such great help to him politically, and to his splendid family I extend my very deepest sympathy. I only wish there was something I could do to help, but I am sure the good Lord will take care of them and comfort them.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. UTT].

Mr. UTT. Mr. Speaker, it was with profound sorrow that I learned of the passing of my friend and colleague, DICK SIMPSON. The true measure of life is not its duration, but rather it is found in its contributions of dedicated service. Our Saviour lived upon this earth for only 35 years, and in this brief time contributed more than we can ever appreciate.

So it was with DICK, a man of faith and a man of works. His death may seem untimely, but who can measure time, in years, as God in His infinite wisdom stretches forth His hand and gathers into His arms His little children, and no one knows the time or the place.

With the inexorable passage of time, each of us will be gathered into His kingdom.

DICK'S friendly help and counsel left nothing to be desired. His memory and influence will long be felt in these Halls of Congress where he served the ideals of Americanism and of Christian faith. He did all that was required of him. He loved mercy, he did justly, and he walked humbly before God. Man can ask no more.

To his wife and family, Mrs. Utt joins me in expressing our deep sympathy.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARRY].

Mr. BARRY. Mr. Speaker, as a junior Member of this body, and as one who has had the privilege of knowing DICK SIMPSON for only a short time, it was my great privilege to discuss on numerous occasions with him not only the political philosophy of our time but also the economic philosophy that has far-reaching consequences for the future of the economy.

I found in DICK SIMPSON a man who was not only a good politician but one highly equipped in scholarly attainment in the fields of finance and industry, and who possessed an understanding and appreciation of all that was good in our way of life. I join those of my colleagues who have paid tribute to a distinguished son of Pennsylvania, but more especially a son of all the people of the United States for a life of service well done.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, in the death of our late colleague and friend, DICK SIMPSON, the House of Representatives has lost one of its most devoted and outstanding Members, and the country a great American. DICK SIMPSON was held in high esteem by his colleagues without regard to political party.

It has been well said that "friendship transcends politics" and this is pointedly so in relation to our late friend.

DICK SIMPSON at all times was a gentleman. As a legislator he held strong convictions based on intellectual honesty. As an American, he loved our country and fearlessly advocated and supported those policies and legislation, even at times when he was in the minority, which he considered were for the national interests of our country and the best interests of our people.

A strong fighter for what he believed in, in disagreement, he respected the views of others.

To me, the best definition of a gentleman is "one who can disagree without being disagreeable."

DICK SIMPSON was such a gentleman.

While he and I differed in many respects on legislation, I thoroughly respected him and his views, because I knew he was intellectually honest. Furthermore, it is well to have represented in the Congress a cross section of American thought, and DICK SIMPSON ably represented in this body any important part of this cross section.

To Mrs. Simpson and her loved ones I extend my deep sympathy in their great loss and sorrow.

GENERAL PERMISSION TO EXTEND REMARKS

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who desire to do so may have 5 legislative days in which to extend their remarks in the RECORD on the life and character of our late colleague.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PRICE). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOODELL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to join my colleagues in commenting on the passing of a great leader and an outstanding Congressman. As one of the youngest Members on the Republican side, my arrival in the House was at the peak of a session, following a special election. It was a great experience but it was also necessary to seek the guidance of men more experienced than myself.

DICK SIMPSON was a man who, without seeming to direct, helped me to find my way through those first hectic days. He was one of the great leaders of this Chamber whose example served to guide me.

I extend to Mrs. Simpson and to her family the sympathy of myself and Mrs. Goodell, as well as that of the 43d District of New York.

DICK SIMPSON had many friends in that district. It was one of these friends who met him one day on the steps of the House Office Building. As always, DICK SIMPSON greeted him warmly. Chatting about the political life, DICK SIMPSON said, "One of the jobs we have to do is to work for the young people and get them interested in public affairs. We need them."

We needed DICK SIMPSON, too, and we will sorely miss him in the halls and on the floor of this great House.

Mr. O'BRIEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, it was with great sadness and shock that

I received word this morning of the death of our admired and respected colleague, the Honorable RICHARD M. SIMPSON.

I had the privilege of serving with DICK SIMPSON on the Committee on Ways and Means and in the House of Representatives for many years. We served on different sides of the political aisle, but I wish to pay tribute to the integrity and sincerity of DICK SIMPSON. He was a man who was a stalwart warrior for the causes in which he believed. He was forthright in expressing his opinions, but he always did so without allowing his views on issues to interfere with his personal friendships.

He was admired and respected by all of us on the Committee on Ways and Means and his death will indeed be a loss to the committee and to this House.

To his family I extend my deepest sympathy and condolences. His service to his district and the Nation leaves a monument of which all of his family and his friends can be proud.

Mr. JOHANSEN. Mr. Speaker, in terms of the leadership and service which could have been expected of Congressman RICHARD M. SIMPSON in the days and months ahead, the Nation is vastly poorer for his passing. So too is this House. So too is the political party in whose councils he exercised great and constructive influence. So too are his State and his district.

Yet, it is not for us to question the ways of Providence.

Instead, let us take consolation in the fact that we are vastly richer for the contributions of wise statesmanship, courageous leadership, devoted service and warm friendship he has given during his more than two decades of membership in this House.

I mourn DICK SIMPSON as a colleague and a friend.

Together with Mrs. Johansen, I extend deepest sympathy to Mrs. Simpson and all of the family.

Mr. AUCHINCLOSS. Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to estimate the great loss that Congress and his host of friends have suffered in the death of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, RICHARD M. SIMPSON. He was an outstanding example of honest thinking, of fearlessness, and of devotion to his country. His loyalty to his friends and his helpful sympathy and advice when the going was rough will never be forgotten. He was endowed with a most intuitive mind, sensitive to the feelings of others, that made his friendship a most precious thing. His humility made him a preeminent example of the precept that "he who would be first among you must be the servant of all." He was a gentleman of the first order and devoted his life to promoting that which was good and wholesome. I was privileged to call him friend and there is now a great void in my life which will only be filled by the memory of a great and wonderful man.

My heartfelt sympathy goes out to his widow and family and may the thoughts and prayers of their many friends support them in this hour of sorrow.

Mr. RHODES of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues in paying tribute to our friend, the late Honorable RICHARD M. SIMPSON, of Pennsylvania.

Twice in recent months, death has deprived us of distinguished Members of our Pennsylvania delegation, the late Congressman Alvin R. Bush having left our midst only several weeks ago.

Both these fine gentlemen served our State and Nation ably during their period of service in this body. They will be missed in the crucial days ahead.

I extend my condolences to Mrs. Bush, Mrs. Simpson, and their families.

Mr. McINTIRE. Mr. Speaker, the untimely passing of the Honorable RICHARD M. SIMPSON deeply saddens all who over his lifetime have had the privilege of his friendship and acquaintance.

The State of Pennsylvania, as well as the Nation, has lost a distinguished citizen of courage and conviction.

During the years we have served together in this House, he has been a warm friend to me, one whose counsel I sought on many occasions.

He supported with earnest endeavor the cause of the Republican Party, and he unselfishly devoted his time and talent to the affairs of the party and those seeking election to office under its banner.

Memory of DICK will remain always as a guiding star to all of us who knew him well. We mourn his passing and our great loss.

MRS. McINTIRE joins with me in expressing deepest sympathy to Mrs. Simpson and members of the family.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the tragic death of DICK SIMPSON has brought real grief to all of us who knew him, who were associated with him in the House of Representatives, and who were privileged to be his friends.

The suddenness of his untimely passing has been a shock to all of his colleagues.

DICK SIMPSON was a man of great integrity, sincerity of purpose, and loyalty to his friends. While we served on different sides of the political aisle and did not always agree on the problems which came before the committee and before the House, I had the greatest admiration for the integrity of DICK SIMPSON, his forthrightness, and the warmth of his personality. He will be missed on the Committee on Ways and Means and in this House and by his constituents.

To his dear wife and members of his family go my most heartfelt prayers in their hour of bereavement and my deepest sympathy and condolences.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. Speaker, it was with a feeling of profound sorrow that I learned this morning of the death of our colleague, DICK SIMPSON.

No Member of Congress was held in higher regard and respect by his colleagues. We who served with him on the Ways and Means Committee were in a position to know and recognize better than many others his great integrity, fine character, and devotion to the public service. He was a tower of strength, a wise counselor, devoted to those principles in which he so sincerely believed. The Congress, the State of Pennsylvania, and the Nation have lost a valued Representative. We will all miss him greatly. He was a devoted husband and father and a loyal friend. My deepest sympathy goes out to the members of his beloved family.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, we meet in sorrow today to pay tribute to the memory of one who has lived and worked amongst us for many years.

RICHARD MURRAY SIMPSON, the son of Warren Brown and Sue Miller Simpson, was born on August 30, 1900.

Following his graduation from high school he joined the U.S. Army to become in 1918 a member of the 301st Company Tank Corps in Raleigh, N.C. After the war he attended the University of Pittsburgh where he got his bachelor of science degree in 1923. Some years later in Washington, D.C., he studied at the Georgetown University Law School for his law degree which was granted in 1942.

While engaged in the insurance and guaranty business which he had entered upon leaving college in 1823, he was elected in 1935 to the Pennsylvania House of Representatives, where I had the privilege of serving with him from 1935 to 1937 when he moved to the U.S. Congress.

He early displayed firm convictions in whatever course he believed to be right. and did not at any time hesitate to speak up for what he thought the practical program for legislation; thus, during his first year in 1937 in this House he voted in opposition to proposed legislation granting $1,500,000 for relief in 1938. In the second session of his first Congress he supported a measure for naval expansion and the wage-hour bill.

In the years which followed, he showed himself a man of breadth and understanding in the critical decisions which came before Congress in foreign affairs in general.

As a member of the Ways and Means Committee he excelled as a spokesman for his party.

His career extending 22 years in this House was too long and varied for a detailed appraisal at this time when he has left us so suddenly, but all of us here who were privileged to know him and serve with him can bear witness this day of his fidelity to duty, his personal kindliness, and, from first to last, unblemished integrity. It is from such qualities that Congress is able to draw support for the measures which directly serve the best interest of the Nation. Without him and men like him we could not function as a National Legislature upon which, not merely this Nation, but the world depends.

Mr. Speaker, I know that all will join with me in a most sincere expression, both of sorrow and of very great respect for the colleague who has just left us, and extend to his wife and family our heartfelt sympathy and the assurance that in the memory of no living Member of this body will RICHARD M. SIMPSON be forgotten.

Mr. BETTS. Mr. Speaker, many words have been spoken in tribute to DICK SIMPSON, but too much cannot be said about this great public servant. He and I belonged to the same committee in Congress, the same political party, and the same college fraternity. I had the opportunity to observe him as a member of each and I can truthfully say that I never saw one more loyal and devoted to the causes with which he was affiliated. No one could know him and work with him without being conscious of the fact that he was a great man. Ability, loyalty, and integrity are adjectives we use to express our highest praise, and they all applied to DICK SIMPSON.

I am grateful for the privilege I had of knowing him and working with him. It was an inspiration which meant much to me, and I join my colleagues and his host of friends and admirers in expressing my sympathy to Mrs. Simpson and his loved ones.

Mr. BUDGE. Mr. Speaker, my return to Washington for the new session was immediately saddened by the news of the critical illness of my dear friend, DICK SIMPSON.

Continuously during the 9 years I was privileged to know him my admiration and respect for him increased. DICK was that kind of person—one whose fine qualities and deep sincerity became more apparent with longer acquaintance. His constant and effective battle for those things in which he believed should entitle him to have his epitaph read: "Here lies a great fighter and a great American."

It is most difficult for me to understand why he has been stricken down at the height of a career marked by courage, ability, and integrity. The Congress of the United States has today lost one of its finest Members and the State of Pennsylvania one of the greatest Representatives in its history.

My deepest sympathies go forward to his charming wife and family.

Mr. ALGER. Mr. Speaker, the Supreme Architect has taken back DICK SIMPSON. Those of us remaining are the losers, although we all benefited by knowing him. We will miss him. He gave unstintingly of himself to others. It seems appropriate to me to think of DICK in the words of my pastor who said that "God works through people." I was greatly privileged to share DICK's friendship as a fellow Congressman, including our joint work on the congressional committee and the Committee on Ways and Means. Those brief 5 years of association with him now comprise a precious and heart-warming memory. DICK, you are gone from us, but will never be forgotten.

Mr. CEDERBERG. Mr. Speaker, I join with Members of the House and others in expressing profound sorrow at the untimely passing of our colleague, Representative RICHARD SIMPSON. When I came to Congress I soon learned to know DICK SIMPSON as a quiet man but ready and willing to give kindly counsel when requested. I cherish the memories of my association with him here on the floor and in party councils during the 5 years I have known him. I found him to be, first, thoroughly devoted to maintaining the great principles of the American form of government and, second, to the Republican Party, whose national congressional committee he headed at the time of his passing.

The Nation has lost a patriot and statesman and Congress has lost a brilliant Member.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, although his committee associates had been saddened in recent weeks by the knowledge that he had been confined to the hospital for major surgery, it was a shock today to receive the word that our distinguished and beloved colleague, DICK SIMPSON would not return among us.

As the leader of the minority on the Committee on Ways and Means, he made a notable and continuing contribution to the cause of earnest and sincere legislating. He was an industrious student of the complex areas of the law in which our committee labors—taxation, tariffs, unemployment, old age, survivor and disability insurance.

Whatever the position he concluded was proper on a legislative issue, he came to committee prepared to contend forcefully for it. He was a worthy and respected adversary for those of us who, from time to time found ourselves obliged to differ with his view.

DICK SIMPSON, in the wisdom of the Almighty, has been taken away at the height of his usefulness. The loss is not only that of his family, friends, constituents and party, but of the Nation as a whole, which he sought always to serve in the way he saw as the right. He was a great American.

Our sympathy goes out at this sad time to Mrs. Simpson and the other members of his fine family.

Mr. VAN PELT. Mr. Speaker, I was indeed shocked to learn of the untimely passing of our good friend and colleague, DICK SIMPSON. I came to know DICK in my early days as a Member of the House of Representatives, and my deep respect continued to grow through the years.

I was closely associated with him in the Republican campaign committee, and only 3 years ago he came to our district in Wisconsin to deliver the principal address at a Lincoln Day program.

The 18th Congressional District of Pennsylvania and the Nation have lost an outstanding American.

I wish to join with his host of friends in extending my deep sympathy to his widow and to his family.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, I was shocked, as was every Member of the House, when I heard the sad news of the passing of my good friend, RICHARD M. SIMPSON. His passing is not only of grave concern to those of us in the House of Representatives; it should be of concern, as well, to all the people of the United States.

DICK SIMPSON was one of the great men of America. He was a great lawmaker and humanitarian. He was also a leader with an ability and effectiveness matched by few, surpassed by none.

As ranking minority member on the House Committee on Ways and Means, Mr. SIMPSON was capable, just, and true to the trust placed in him. He devoted his energies unstintingly to the work of drafting equitable legislation to provide funds for the Government while at the same time protecting the rights of individual citizens.

As chairman of the House Republican campaign committee, DICK SIMPSON devoted long and arduous hours working for his colleagues in that party. He was unfailingly present and ready to help when called upon by one of his fellow members. He was ever ready to give sound advice to those who sought it from him. His advice was always good and bore fruit when accepted and followed.

However, he was not one to force his will or his advice on any man. He was not the type of leader who prodded or pushed. He was, rather, the type who set an example which others were willing and eager to follow.

The Nation has lost one of its most capable leaders in the untimely death of DICK SIMPSON. I feel a personal loss as must every Member of this House. The people of Pennsylvania and the Nation have lost a servant who has served long and well.

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleagues on the Committee on Ways and Means and in this House in expressing the deep grief and sadness which I experienced when I learned of the death of DICK SIMPSON. It was indeed a shock to me. His district, the House of Representatives, and the Nation have suffered a loss in his passing.

It happened that we began our service here together in the 75th Congress. In the work of the House and of the committee, I came to have the very highest regard for his integrity, his clarity of mind and purpose, and the strength with which he espoused the causes in which he believed. He had many friends, not only here and in his district, but throughout the Nation. He earned the confidence of the members of the committee and of this House. He was a man of great energy and strength. He rendered high public service to his district, the Congress, and the Nation.

I wish to extend to members of his family my deepest sympathy on his sudden and untimely passing. In their bereavement they can perhaps find a measure of comfort in the knowledge that he has left a monument of many years of public service of which they can all be proud.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the House of Representatives, the great State of Pennsylvania, and the country at large has lost a great man, a statesman in every sense of the word.

RICHARD SIMPSON was devoted to his duties as a legislator. He was an expert. Members sought his advice. Legislation approved by the Committee on Ways and Means has shown the imprint of his great knowledge. DICK SIMPSON was a man of unusually high character. He was a man of courage and conviction. His word was absolutely good. Although Members had opposite views from those Mr. SIMPSON advocated, they respected his opinion and his beliefs. He has been described as "a mighty oak that never yielded in the storm."

RICHARD SIMPSON was always glad to give advice to younger Members who sought his assistance. DICK SIMPSON did not bear any malice to those who disagreed with him. He loved people. He loved his country. He was one of God's noblemen. I join with my colleagues in mourning the loss of a great man who left his imprint upon the world that will not be erased.

A great poet said:

Lives of great men all remind us
We can make our lives sublime,
And, departing, leave behind us
Footprints on the sands of time.

RICHARD M. SIMPSON has left his imprint on the lives of those who had the privilege of knowing him.

I join with my colleagues today in extending deepest sympathy to the family of our beloved friend, and colleague, RICHARD M. SIMPSON.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, it was with deep regret that I learned of the passing of my esteemed colleague from Pennsylvania, RICHARD SIMPSON.

His death will mean a tremendous loss, not only to the members of his family, but to the people of his congressional district and the Nation as well. Congressman SIMPSON served the 18th District of Pennsylvania for 22 years. The loyalty and respect felt for him by his constituents have been demonstrated by the majorities with which he has been returned to Congress election after election. The loyalty and respect felt for him by his colleagues in this body have been demonstrated by the responsible position he was accorded on the important Ways and Means Committee.

Another measure of this man's greatness is more personal to me. I will always remember his kindness and understanding, particularly at the beginning of my term in Congress. He had the bigness of heart and the greatness of spirit to extend to me—a member of the opposite party—the benefit of his long experience in the House. I am sure that many other freshman Members have been benefited from his counsel.

Although many of the Members on this side of the aisle might frequently have disagreed with his legislative views, Congressman SIMPSON had the devotion and respect of the entire House. His dedication to the principles in which he believed was an inspiration and a source of education to all. His forthrightness and courage in speaking out on legislative matters were a source of admiration.

To Mrs. Simpson and to other members of his family I extend my sincere sympathy.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, It has been my privilege to see many well qualified, patriotic Members come to Congress, my regret to see many of them leave. It was my privilege to speak with and for our colleague at Frostburg, Pa., in his first campaign in 1937. From that day to the day he left for the hospital, he was always helpful and instructive.

Our colleague had convictions, he had courage, he intelligently and vigorously pressed for the adoption of legislation which he was convinced would be helpful to the Nation as a whole as well as beneficial to his constituents who, in him, never had a more considerate and capable Representative. That statement is near the ultimate in compliment when we remember the service of Robert Rich who, when an authorization or appropriation bill was before the House, never failed to ask, "Where will we get the money?" A question which is still with us and which apparently our colleague always had in mind, both when consulting us individually or acting as a member of the Ways and Means Committee.

Our colleague, though a vigorous advocate of the things which he believed to be best for our country, was not only sincere and vigorous in support of his views, but he was modest, he was humble, and—an equally desirable but somewhat rare characteristic—considerate of the views of his colleagues.

Though in the main our views traveled in parallel lines—I can recall no exception—he never failed to be courteous and considerate of the expression of convictions by his colleagues. He never criticized the way they voted—giving to others a charitable evaluation we sometimes did not give to him.

Even though some of us knew, as we adjourned last year, that he was in ill health, his death came as a shock, for with it, each and every one of us who knew him realized we had lost a friend—an able, valuable, public servant. Those he left behind will continue to miss him, but they should take some satisfaction in the fact that he left behind a record of able, vigorous, patriotic service to his district, his State, and the Nation.

Though not closely associated in our work he was my friend and I was his. He left behind a record of faithful service to all and were he with us this afternoon when skies are dark and weather chill, I am sure DICK would have joined us in Tennyson's words and thought:

CROSSING THE BAR

Sunset and evening star,
And one clear call for me!
And may there be no moaning of the bar,
When I put out to sea.

But such a tide as moving seems asleep,
Too full for sound and foam,
When that which drew from out the boundless deep
Turns again home.

Twilight and evening bell,
And after that the dark!
And may there be no sadness of farewell,
When I embark.

For tho' from out our bourne of Time and Place
The flood may bear me far,
I hope to see my Pilot face to face
When I have crost the bar.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, although the passing of our colleague, the Honorable RICHARD M. SIMPSON, was not unexpected in view of his protracted illness, it nevertheless came as a shock for I had hoped with his many friends that somehow he would be able to overcome his affliction.

As Dr. FENTON has so well said, there was no Member of the House of Representatives more capable of dealing with the problems of our time, and certainly there was no Member possessing, in greater measure the virtues of integrity, determination, and courage.

In the death of DICK SIMPSON the House has suffered an irreparable loss and I have lost a friend.

Mrs. Gross joins me in extending heartfelt sympathy to Mrs. Simpson and the members of their family. May their grief be tempered in the knowledge of the imprint which DICK SIMPSON left in the records of Congress and the high esteem in which he was held by his colleagues.

Mr. RHODES of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, it was with a sense of profound shock that I learned of the serious illness of my good friend DICK SIMPSON. I am sure that the prayers and thoughts of all Members of Congress were with DICK during his illness, and are with him now. Those prayers extend to the family of our friend and colleague, asking that the Almighty may assuage their grief and leave them only with the memory of the fine strong man that was DICK SIMPSON, and a solemn pride in his life, his accomplishments, and the niche which he has carved for himself in history and in the hearts of all who knew him.

My association with DICK SIMPSON was primarily in my capacity as a member and secretary of the National Republican Congressional Committee. I was privileged to serve as secretary under DICK'S chairmanship for the last 4 years. He had a fine mind, great resolution, and an outstanding ability to get things done. His devotion to duty was probably the crowning aspect of his entire character. Once he had agreed to do something, it could be regarded by all as having been done.

DICK SIMPSON possessed many virtues. The one which stands out in my mind is his modesty in all things. I have never heard him utter a single word of self-praise, or even one which caused me to believe that he recognized in himself the abilities which others saw in him. Rather, he was full of praise for his fellow workers, and anxious that they should receive the credit for any tasks well done.

The Congress will miss DICK SIMPSON. The country will miss him. The people of Pennsylvania, and particularly of his own congressional district, will miss him. To Mrs. Simpson and the Simpson family, I extend my heartfelt condolences and sincere sympathy, in which Mrs. Rhodes joins me.

Mr. BELCHER. Mr. Speaker, the death of RICHARD M. SIMPSON comes as a great shock to all of us who have had the privilege through the years to enjoy his warm and loyal friendship.

I met DICK SIMPSON when I first came to Congress at the beginning of 82d Congress. We became very close and warm friends.

DICK was a man of stalwart character, high integrity, and strong convictions. He had the courage of his convictions and would fight for what he thought was right. Yet, he was always kind and courteous and accorded those who disagreed with him the right of their convictions.

He was an able Congressman, and had the respect and love of his colleagues on both sides of the aisle. He was never narrowminded or petty. He was devoted to the service of his community, State and Nation. Perhaps it was his zeal in trying to serve his constituents to the best of his ability that hastened his death. The better you knew DICK SIMPSON, the better you loved him; he was indeed a wise and sympathetic counselor.

My life has been enriched, and I am eternally grateful for having known DICK SIMPSON.

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, I was indeed saddened this morning to receive news of the passing of our friend and distinguished colleague, the Honorable RICHARD M. SIMPSON, of Pennsylvania.

While I was of course aware of Congressman SIMPSON'S recent serious illness and operation, I somehow felt that he might have a normal recovery since he always appeared to be very rugged and healthy. His rapid decline and passing was a great shock to all of us.

I always considered DICK SIMPSON to be a most capable and conscientious public servant. During his long career as a Member of this Body he left a profound imprint on his colleagues and friends. He will be greatly missed by the people of his district, the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the entire Nation.

I extend my sincere and deepest sympathy to his wife and family.

Mr. KILBURN. Mr. Speaker, I was awfully sorry to hear of the serious illness and then the death of my dear friend, DICK SIMPSON. Over the years we have talked over many problems before the House and he was always so sound and so kind and considerate to me.

I shall miss him and I extend my deepest sympathy to Mrs. Simpson.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, it is hard to realize that the able and devoted Representative, RICHARD M. SIMPSON, will no longer be with us. For all our difference of religious affiliation and political loyalties, I have felt very close to DICK SIMPSON, as I have been priviliged to work with him for many years in a common devotion to the welfare of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and of the United States of America. Much has been said on this floor, and in the other body, in exalted praise of DICK SIMPSON'S conscientious dedication to the service of his country, of his sincerity and energy and ability. I shall not attempt to repeat what has been so ably and eloquently said in honor of the memory of DICK SIMPSON, but I should like to comment simply that, to one who knew DICK SIMPSON well, not one word in all this chorus of eulogy has rung false. Nothing but good has been said of him, because there was nothing but good to be said. He was a man who would not condone a wrong or serve a falsehood, whether by act, by speech, or by silence.

Typical of DICK SIMPSON'S driving ambition to serve his country to the best of his magnificent ability is the story of his early years in Congress, when, finding that he was assigned to the House Committee on Ways and Means, and that a knowledge of law would contribute significantly to the value of his work on that committee, he immediately enrolled in the Georgetown Law School, taking night courses in law, while carrying out his legislative duties with undiminished energy, for the 4 years necessary for the achievement of his degree. That is the spirit in which DICK SIMPSON, throughout his life, undertook and carried out all the duties that circumstances laid upon him, and all the duties that he himself perceived and chose to perform. For no personal advantage, for no political loyalty, for no lofty cause, would he do or permit any unfair act, but drove always with resolute determination at the accomplishment of great results by fair and honest means.

I wish to join my friends, and DICK SIMPSON'S friends, in the Congress, in expressing to his wife and their daughter, Kay Josephine, to his two older daughters, Susan, and Barbara, and to his three stepsons, our heartfelt sorrow and sympathy.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, this morning RICHARD SIMPSON, Representative from the 18th District of Pennsylvania, passed away.

He had been a Member of this House for 23 years and had great ability. He was the ranking Republican member of the Ways and Means Committee, and was one of its ablest and most active members.

He stood for the things that he believed in and was one of the most courageous men in the House. He was always courteous. He was one of the best debaters we had on the floor of the House. He was always prepared on the bills that he had to deal with, and his thoughts on them were always forcefully expressed.

It seems too bad that one only 60 years of age should be taken away, yet we must be thankful that we had the benefit of his talents and his character and his devotion to his work for so long a time.

I wish to extend to his widow and his children my sincerest and deepest sympathy.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I join with the other Members of Congress in expressing the loss that we all feel with the passing of our colleague, Hon. RICHARD M. SIMPSON.

In my brief association with him, I was impressed by his tremendous political courage and the strength of his convictions. His intense loyalty to the Republican Party, his stalwart conservative convictions and his personal desire to give the best possible representation to the people of his district were apparent in all his actions. His leadership will be missed by those of us who looked to him for counsel and inspiration.

I extend to Mrs. Simpson and their family my sincere sympathy.

Mr. PIRNIE. Mr. Speaker, the passing of RICHARD M. SIMPSON is a great loss to the Congress and the country.

As a public servant he will long be remembered for his strength of character and unassailable integrity. His sound judgment and keen intellect prompted his elevation to many positions of high responsibility in the House and within his party. These duties he discharged with such quiet efficiency that more and more demands were made upon his time and energy. Until his death he was fulfilling major assignments in a way which commanded the respect and confidence of all with whom he was associated.

He will be remembered for his sympathetic and wise counsel which he generously shared. In all respects he was faithful to his trust.

RICHARD SIMPSON was truly an American patriot, whose services are gratefully recalled and whose spirited devotion to his firm convictions will remain an inspiration.

To Mrs. Simpson and the family, I extend the sincere sympathy of the 34th New York District, trusting that they will be comforted by the enduring blessing of his life so nobly lived.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I was shocked to learn several weeks ago of the serious illness of my good friend and colleague, DICK SIMPSON. I hoped and prayed, as we all did, that he would survive the serious operation he had to undergo. Words cannot express how saddened I was to learn that the Lord, in His wisdom, had taken DICK from us.

My association with DICK SIMPSON was a brief one; I came to know him a few short years ago when I was elected to serve in this House. But, I soon learned that he was one of the truly dedicated members of our party. He was sincere in his convictions and he fought for those convictions when the occasion demanded a fight. He communicated this spirit to his colleagues and served his party, his constituency and his country with perseverance and distinction.

The loss of DICK SIMPSON will be felt by all of us who knew and worked with him. He has left a vacancy in this House and in our hearts that will not be easily filled.

I extend my sincere sympathy to Mrs. Simpson and his family. May they take some solace in knowing that so many mourn in his passing with them.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. Speaker, the passing of our good friend RICHARD M. SIMPSON, is a great loss to the Congress, to the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and to our Nation. That he has left our midst is a tragedy to the causes of good government, human liberty, and economic opportunity.

DICK SIMPSON was characterized by his integrity, commonsense, and an unswerving devotion to the principles in which he believed. Those principles are better principles today because of the fact that this American lived.

During the past 7 years that I had the opportunity to know this great patriot, I found him to be a public servant who was devoted to the concept of responsibility; responsibility in office, politics, and in his personal life. It can be truly said of DICK SIMPSON that he thought more of his obligations than he did of his privileges. No finer quality could any man possess.

As a member of the Committee on Ways and Means and the Republican congressional campaign committee, I became closely associated with DICK, and I profited time and time again by his wise counsel and by his high courage.

I realize full well the futility of our words at this time to alleviate the sorrow of the Simpson family; however, I want to bring my humble words of condolence to them in the hope and belief that their faith in the will of our Heavenly Father will fill them with the spirit of acceptance and peace that join the faithful now and in eternity.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, in the passing of DICK SIMPSON the House has lost an honest and hard-working Member and the country a statesman of vision and courage. The accomplishments of this man will not soon be forgotten nor will his leadership and the force of his personality be soon dispelled from those of us in this body who were privileged to work closely with him.

This man was well chosen to carry out his responsibility as a public servant. His recognized abilities and his strength of character elevated him to positions of leadership in his community and then in the House and the Republican Party. His loss will be felt in each of these circles within which he was looked to for guidance and inspiration.

I give my deepest sympathy to Mrs. Simpson and to the late Congressman's children. The sorrow they feel at the passing of this loved one is echoed by the entire Nation.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, in the tragic death of RICHARD SIMPSON the Congress has lost one of its great leaders and the Nation is made poorer by his passing. He was a man of stature in the rich tradition of Americans who have dedicated their lives to the service of their country. The principles for which he fought so eloquently sprang from a deep conviction that representative government must be both responsive and responsible. He clearly understood this delicate balance in his untiring efforts for all the people of his country.

DICK SIMPSON was my friend whom I admired for his courage, the clarity of his convictions, and his sincere and unswerving loyalty to principle. Perhaps even more I admired qualities of kindliness and humanity which he possessed in such abundance.

I join with my colleagues here in mourning his loss and I wish to extend to his family my most profound sympathy in this time of sorrow.

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, the sudden and unexpected passing of Congressman DICK SIMPSON has left a vacancy in the House of Representatives which will be impossible to fill.

DICK SIMPSON was a close personal friend of mine, and his sturdy character, high integrity, unquestioned loyalty, and honest conviction commanded the respect of all of his friends and acquaintances.

He was not the type who would yield to expediency and was always ready and willing to use his great influence to protect the people of the district he represented as well as all people throughout the Nation against any attempt to subvert or subordinate the power and dignity of the United States.

It is difficult to express in words the feelings you have for the loss of a close personal friend.

I wish to join my other colleagues in expressing my sincere sympathy to his beloved wife and family for the great loss they have sustained.

Mr. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, it was with great grief and sorrow that Mrs. Bentley and I recently learned of the untimely passing of our beloved colleague, RICHARD M. SIMPSON, who had represented the 18th District of Pennsylvania in the House ever since 1937. We were particularly shocked over the sad news since we and the Simpsons were close neighbors in Chevy Chase, Md., and since one of our own children was a good friend of one of the Simpson boys.

While Congressman SIMPSON's notable achievements both before and since his first election to Congress have been fully covered in the remarks of his sorrowing colleagues, I merely wish to say that I considered DICK SIMPSON as a close personal friend and feel a personal sense of loss at the news of his passing. Mrs. Bentley and I certainly extend our deepest and heartfelt sympathy to the sorrowing members of the bereaved family.

Mr. RHODES of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, we in the Pennsylvania delegation mourn the passing of RICHARD M. SIMPSON, an outstanding and capable legislator and vigorous leader of his party's Congressional Campaign Committee.

A Member of this body for 23 years, DICK SIMPSON was respected by all of his colleagues. He had a most pleasant personality and a strong character. He was kind and friendly. He was able, articulate, and industrious in carrying out the duties of his office. Our State and the Nation will miss his service in these perilous times.

I extend my sincere condolences to his family on their great loss.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, I was shocked to learn of the untimely passing of our colleague, RICHARD SIMPSON. I do not know of any man who has served as a Member of the Congress during the 22 years I have been privileged to serve in the House who was more highly respected than RICHARD SIMPSON. He was a tower of strength on the great Ways and Means Committee and both we Democrats and the Republicans could always depend on him to render a sound decision and cast a sound vote on any legislation under consideration by that committee.

Mr. SIMPSON was certainly a leader of the highest caliber and will be missed by every person privileged with his acquaintance. He was never too busy to talk to any Member who had a bill pending before the Ways and Means Committee. RICHARD SIMPSON had just arrived at the age where he could be of some real service to the people of his great State and our Nation. He had the necessary legislative experience and had the respect of every Member of Congress and even though his proposals did not always meet with the approval of every Member of the Congress, they knew that he was expressing his real opinion which he thought would be best not only for his State, but for the Nation.

Mrs. McMillan joins me in expressing our deepest sympathy to Mrs. Simpson and the entire family. We can ill afford to lose men of RICHARD SIMPSON's caliber here in the Congress of the United States during these critical times.

Mr. MACK of Washington. Mr. Speaker with the passing of my long-time friend and colleague RICHARD SIMPSON, DICK most of us fondly called him, the Nation lost a great and able statesman and we who knew him best a kind, companionable and lovable friend.

DICK SIMPSON was gifted with an alert and constructive mind. He dug hard and diligently for facts. Once he possessed them he based his decisions on the facts as he found them and courageously made known his views letting the chips fall where they would.

Because of his forthrightness and courage he held the confidence and respect of friend and foe, if those of different political opinions can be called foes. His influence was great. He was universally liked, admired and respected by all who knew him. DICK SIMPSON will be greatly missed in the Halls of Congress.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, we in America have lost a real champion in the passing of DICK SIMPSON, our illustrious colleague from Pennsylvania. DICK SIMPSON epitomized integrity, forthrightness, and responsibility in Government by his every action. His sincerity has always been an inspiration to me.

Through the years that I have known DICK SIMPSON, he always had a moment in his busy schedule to counsel and assist each one of us so that we could better perform our responsibilities as representatives of the people. It is rare to find a man of his character and understanding.

I join with all my colleagues in expressing my deepest sympathy to Mrs. Simpson and his family.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution.

The Clerk read the resolution (H. Res. 415), as follows:

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Staffing Freedom

OF
HON. WILLIAM PROXMIRE
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, January 7, 1960

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, from time to time one of our colleagues writes an article of such unusual thoughtfulness and understanding that I consider it a shame we do not all have a chance to read it. Such an article appeared in the Atlantic Monthly for November, under the title "Staffing Freedom." It was written by the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK]. Eloquently, it discusses a subject long close to his heart, as it should be to all of us, the question of how to steer our most important resource; namely, the best and ablest of our young people, into positions where they can help build the kind of creative country in which we want to live, and which we would like to pass on to our children.

The article is subtitled "An Appeal." To help all of us to hear and heed it I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STAFFING FREEDOM—AN APPEAL BY SENATOR JOSEPH S. CLARK

(Pennsylvania's senior Senator and former mayor of Philadelphia, JOSEPH S. CLARK, donated his Bok Award funds, received in 1956, to the American Academy of Political and Social Science for a study of national personnel needs)

What kind of country do we Americans want? What kind of universe do we wish to live in?

Survival in freedom with a reasonable chance for happiness would be the answer for most of us. I think of a creative country in which there is respect for the brotherhood of man.

It is only when we start discussing policies, programs, and procedures that we get into trouble. My concern is with people, not methods. How can we find, train, and hold in the right jobs people needed to create what Walter Lippmann calls the "good society"?

Today we have no national personnel policy or plan. We do not try to steer our best young people into the careers where their brains are needed. We leave the choice to chance and the marketplace. We hope that a sense of dedication will prove more compelling than the dollar reward.

Not only are we short of teachers; too many of those we have are not really good enough. We have plenty of politicians, but many of them are hardly worth the powder to blow them away.

Does it really make sense to siphon our ability into color television, the manufacture and sale of soft drinks, cigarettes, whisky, and cosmetics, and the advertising of these commodities? Hasn't the time come to start thinking about how to put American capabilities into jobs where they can best advance American national interests?

In 1942, Military Occupation Specialty (MOS) determined where one served "the cause of freedom." The planners in the Pentagon decided the necessary qualifications of each GI and each officer required to man our armed services. That was a hot war, and this one is cold. Compulsion would not work today; but persuasion might.

They plan well in Russia. There someone decides where little Ivan is going to work. If, at the age of 11, he seems unresponsive, he goes back to the collective farm. If he shows promise, his education is continued at state expense through technical school and the university. Education and incentives for different occupations are adjusted to meet the personnel needs required by the current 5- or 7-year plain.

In continental Europe and Great Britain, educational and occupational planning is far ahead of our chaotic American hit or miss.

Would we lose our sacred freedoms if we tried by persuasion to get what others achieve by compulsion? I think not. Is it so difficult to inventory our personnel requirements? Ewan Clague, the U.S. Commissioner of Labor Statistics, tells us that the job is already well begun. He has published a handbook estimating the prospects in 600 different occupations.

Surely wise men and women can set tentative priorities among these occupations. A White House conference on national personnel requirements would do more than start people thinking; it could determine empirically how many well-trained people we are likely to need in the next 30 years to achieve our national goals.

The next question is, How can we use both the carrot and the stick to get these young people trained and on their way to where they are needed? How can we get more and better teachers, scientists, priests, politicians, rabbis, ministers, musicians, poets, and social workers? To get them we will have to settle for fewer brewers, nightclub proprietors, and lobbyists.

Perhaps our national sense of values needs a little adjusting. Perhaps the wrong people are making too much money and the right people not enough. How about the status seekers? Can we make it as chic to be a graduate nurse working in a hospital as an interior decorator specializing in drapes?

This realization of shortage should generate a lot of talk, which sometimes in America is a prelude to action. Those old rallying points—the home, the church, and the school—might conceivably resound with fresh words and determination about a boy's future. Such talk could spread to newspaper editors, commentators, comic strip artists, and cartoonists. After a time the talk might result in a national purpose to staff freedom with our best and ablest brains instead of leaving matters to chance. The tools are at hand to do the job once the decision is made. All we need is the will to act. And the "good society" which could result might both confound communism and lift Western civilization to new heights.

Prevention of Tolls on Interstate Bridge Across Columbia River on U.S. Highway 99, Between Portland, Oreg., and Vancouver, Wash.

OF
HON. RICHARD L. NEUBERGER
OF OREGON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, January 7, 1960

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, tolls on the Interstate Bridge across the Columbia River connecting Portland, Oreg., with Vancouver, Wash., were reinstituted on January 4, 1960, on the Federal Interstate Pacific Coast Highway.

Along the entire length of U.S. Highway 99 from the Canadian border to the Mexican border the Vancouver-Portland Bridge is the only toll bridge. Initially, the Portland-Vancouver Columbia River Bridge was constructed and opened on February 15, 1917, and welded Portland and Vancouver into one metropolitan trading area. Tolls were originally charged, but the bridge has been toll free for many years. A new bridge alongside the old one has been opened and tolls are now being charged.

This, I think, is a serious mistake and as a member of the Senate Public Works Committee and the Subcommittee on Roads and Highways, I have introduced legislation, S. 2404, to provide for a toll-free bridge connecting Portland and Vancouver. This legislation is sponsored by the two distinguished Senators from Washington State, along with my colleague, Senator MORSE.

The basic mistake that has been made was by the Oregon Legislature in 1953, which provided for a new bridge with tolls. If the new bridge had been delayed just several months, it could have been incorporated into the Interstate Federal Highway System and would have qualified for 90 percent Federal aid. Both Mrs. Neuberger and I, as members of the Oregon Legislature at that time, voted against this 1953 bill which has turned out to be such a serious mistake.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an editorial from the Oregonian of December 22 dealing with the tolls on the new Interstate Bridge, together with a copy of a letter which I have written to the editor of the newspaper dated January 7, providing my views on this important subject.

There being no objection, the editorial and letter were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ARTIFICIAL BARRIER

Thirty-one years ago this coming New Year's Day the tolls were removed from the Interstate Bridge between Portland and Vancouver. This span, built as a joint effort by the people of Multnomah and Clark Counties, had been turned over to the State of Oregon with the firm understanding that when enough tolls had been collected to retire the bonds, the bridge forever after would be free.

Now a new bridge has been built alongside the old one. To help pay for the new bridge, tolls after January 4, 1960, will be collected from the users of both bridges. This arrangement was ordered by the 1953 Oregon Legislature despite the protests of Portland area lawmakers that this was not only of doubtful legality but also was morally indefensible.

Toll bridges are contrary to the policy of the State highway department. All of the bridges built across the wide bays crossed by Highway 101 along the Oregon coast are free. Every State-owned bridge crossing every other river in the State has been financed out of the State highway fund derived from fuel taxes, weight-mile fees on trucks, and vehicle licenses. In the entire length of U.S. Highway 99 from the Canadian to the Mexican border this will be the only toll barrier to free travel.

The people of Portland and Vancouver were farsighted enough to build the Interstate Bridge long before either Oregon or Washington had their present extensive highway networks. Its opening on February 15, 1917, made possible our present Interstate Highway System and the coastwise truck freight carriers that have built up Oregon. It welded the two cities on opposite sides of the Columbia River into one metropolitan trading area, to their mutual advantage.

Since the toll is a modest 20 cents, and heavy traffic on the bridge probably will bring in enough money to retire the bonds and lift the toll by 1970, there is a temptation to shrug off the whole issue. But Portlanders and Vancouverites should not accept this injustice with docility. Any way you look at it, the collection of tolls on the twin interstate bridges is wrong.

There are three possible ways to right this wrong: (1) Challenge in court the right of the State of Oregon to break its promise to the taxpayers of Multnomah and Clark Counties; (2) press in the 1961 Oregon and Washington Legislatures for bills to make the new bridge an obligation of the respective State highway funds; and (3) continue the efforts to make the bridge part of the Federal interstate highway program and thus eligible for 90-percent Federal financing. If those who use the interstate bridges will protest loud enough and long enough, this artificial barrier can be breached.

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, D.C., January 7, 1960.

To the EDITOR of the OREGONIAN:

Your editorial of December 22, 1959, mentioned that one of the solutions to the levying of tolls on the interstate bridges was to continue the efforts to make the bridge part of the Federal interstate highway program and thus eligible for 90 percent Federal financing.

On July 21, 1959, as a member of the Roads and Highways Subcommittee, I introduced a bill in the U.S. Senate to accomplish this purpose. It is S. 2404. Cosponsors with me are Senator MORSE of Oregon and Senators MAGNUSON and JACKSON of Washington State.

The chief obstacle to passage of the bill is the opposition voiced by the Eisenhower administration. With a considerable degree of logic, spokesmen for the administration have argued that, if the interstate toll bridges are put on the Federal system, then what about the $2.5 billion worth of toll roads, bridges and tunnels in other States? The administration has argued that payment of such a colossal sum would retard interstate highway construction in every part of the Nation for many years.

In my opinion, the real blunder was made by the 1953 Oregon Legislature and Governor who, with too much haste, imposed tolls to underwrite the Interstate Bridge construction. By waiting a short time, the bridges would have been on the Federal system and thus would have qualified for 90 percent Federal aid. This was the error responsible for the present situation.

U.S. Senator.

"Why I Am a Democrat"—Address by Senator Randolph, of West Virginia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL H. DOUGLAS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, January 7, 1960

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a very able address, entitled "Why I Am a Democrat," by the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH], which was delivered recently before Bethany College.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHY I AM A DEMOCRAT

(Address by Senator JENNINGS RANDOLPH, Democrat, West Virginia, to the Bethany College Convocation, Bethany, W. Va., December 17, 1959)

President Gresham, members of the faculty, and students, I am appreciative of the opportunity to talk on the subject which has been assigned—Why I Am a Democrat.

Representative ARCH MOORE, my personal friend, preceded me on this platform 2 weeks ago and argued the case for the Republican Party. Knowing ARCH as a man of talents, I trust that he compensated in eloquence for that which his position on party may have lacked. Those of us in the Democratic Party ranks are more fortunate. Confident in the knowledge that truth will triumph, we can afford to exercise a measure of forbearance toward those persons who have not yet seen the light.

Therefore, to those of you who may yet be laboring in the shadows and darkness of political philosophy, I address you more with inquiry than censure. To the rest of the young ladies and the young gentlemen who are or will become Democrats, I welcome you into the challenging struggle of the unfinished business of America.

Now, why am I a Democrat?

First, I am a Democrat because I am young. And do not, in your own youth, be unkind to one who still retains the vision of his. Even though the years are magnified, I will be young with the Democratic Party.

THE YOUNGEST PARTY IN THE UNITED STATES

And the Democratic Party, though the oldest political party in existence, is still the youngest in this country measured by vitality. Ours is the party of youth, for it sees the world in terms of its tomorrows while not relying entirely upon its yesterdays. Ours is the party with eyes in its forehead—not in its hindhead.

In this respect I have sometimes thought that, rather than the elephant, a more appropriate symbol for the other party would be the vain and strutting peacock with a thousand eyes in its tail—all looking backward. However, the elephant, with much memory but little imagination, will do.

It is because the Democratic Party surveys the present in terms of the future that, with only slight interruptions in the past 28 years we have merited the confidence of the majority of the American people. There is justice in this condition, for our party itself has confidence in the citizen and in the American future.

An Englishman once wrote a book "America Is West," a statement which very aptly captures the essential quality of our national strength.

These qualities—of youth, of optimism, of confidence in the frontiers of the future—lie at the heart of the American spirit and of the Democratic Party. It was this spirit which again resulted in the mandate of the electorate having been given to our party in 1958, and enabled us virtually to sweep the congressional and State elections from Maine to California.

It is this purpose which continues to animate the Democratic Party and provides it with new vigor and new ideas.

We hear much today of the need for new faces in politics. But what of the need for new ideas? It is no paradox that the grand matriarch of the Democratic Party, Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, is still intellectually one of the most youthful members of our party, looking always for the infusion of fresh ideas to solve the problems of our times.

But the Republican Party, which occasionally brings forth new faces—as it did in 1952—still espouses the time-worn doctrines of the age of McKinley—or, at best, begrudgingly accepts some of the ideas of the New Deal as unfortunate necessity.

The valid concept of the New Deal and the Fair Deal—and most of them were valid—have become an enduring part of our national, political, and economic life, and have prevented the recurrence of the tragedies of the era of the thirties. Just as the great depression tested the assumptions of the philosophy of "let nature take its course"—and found those assumptions insufficient, so has the period since World War II tested the basic principles of the New Deal—and found them valid. Three times since World War II—in 1949, 1954, and 1958—we have been faced with recession, and on each occasion the reforms of the New Deal have helped turn the tide before it reached a full-scale depression. Thus, the New Deal and Fair Deal programs—social security, protection for bank depositors and investors, wage and hour legislation, expansion of the public works sector of the economy, and agricultural benefits—among many others—have been fully justified.

And yet these three recent recessions have cost the Nation an estimated $400 billion in the loss of production of goods and services—enough to retire the entire national debt, modernize our highway system, provide the necessary schools and hospitals for our people, and cleanse our slums.

FULL-TIME REQUIREMENTS MUST BE MET

We can conclude, therefore, that the programs of the past need to be reevaluated and supplemented. The ever-present fact of change brings forth new problems that demand solutions. Part-time attention to full-time requirements will not suffice.

Emerson once stated that "conservatism is a fault of character." The desire merely to hold to what we have—to be satisfied with the status quo—the failure to explore the future for fear of the unknown—are attitudes born of little faith and less vision.

Now I do not wish to imply that there is no place for the function of conservatism. On the contrary, the Democratic Party has its conservative elements which provide the invaluable asset of assuring that all interests will be weighed and considered before party action is taken. The southerners, by and large, represent such an attitude, and not solely on matters of race relations. The farmers, in certain respects, represent another. And even labor, which has its vested interest in maintaining job security as a property right, occasionally acts as a conservative force in the broad sense.

But all of these elements must be balanced by the force of innovation and invention. Conservatism and experimentation in the body politic are paralleled by memory and imagination in the individual. And in both organisms, both qualities are equally necessary for life to proceed at a truly human level.

It is not enough merely to hold the ground established by those who have gone before us. It is not sufficient to rest with the legacy of the past. But, we must know what we want if we are to improve upon the world we have inherited. We must strengthen the foundation of the society we want.

There is a second reason why I am a Democrat: The Democratic Party is not afraid to dare. Our party, since its founding by Thomas Jefferson in 1794, has been willing to experiment in the public interest.

And it is no accident of history that throughout our national life the significant surges of growth toward the realization of the American dream have been associated with the Democratic Party. In the early days of the Republic it was the States-rights agrarianism of Jefferson's Democratic-Republican Party which routed the narrow mercantile philosophy of the Federalists. I might add, parenthetically, that although Jefferson's party dropped the Republican suffix in 1828, one still finds a Democrat here and there who has not heard of that simplification.

Later, under what we now call Jacksonian Democracy, the western frontiersmen and the eastern mechanics and laborers joined forces to assert their rights of self-government. They were a vigorous group who challenged the patrician prerogatives of the gentry, but they dramatized the ideal of universal suffrage. Then, as in more recent times, it was fashionable to hold the Democratic Party in contempt in so-called polite drawing room circles. As the future Mrs. Jefferson Davis wrote in astonishment of husband-to-be in the early 1840's, "Would you believe it, he is refined and cultivated, and yet he is a Democrat."

And in the 20th century, the New Freedoms of Woodrow Wilson, the New Deal of Franklin Roosevelt, and the Fair Deal of Harry S. Truman—all stand as bench marks for the rising tide of American achievement.

A PARTY OF WORLD LEADERSHIP

The Democratic Party has been no less creative in the field of international relations now that the United States has been propelled into the international community. Woodrow Wilson's Fourteen Points, his "self-determination of nations" and his idea of the League of Nations—though defeated by the circumstances of history—served their time in stirring men's aspirations for international peace and justice.

Today, we Americans and the world at large live in debt to Franklin Roosevelt's idea of the United Nations. Nor could this hope have been brought to fruition without the courage and compassion of the Marshall plan and the point 4 program under President Truman. Party loyalties and partisan bias cannot lessen the importance of these achievements.

Before continuing with a discussion of the present challenge to the creativity of the Democratic Party, there is a third reason why I am a Democrat. It is the party which embraces the broadest interests of the American people. And I say, with all respect—and some sympathy for members of the minority party—ours is the only really national party.

The American political party system is not ideologically oriented as are most of the European systems, and, to a somewhat less extent, the British. Our parties are based upon the representation of different geographic, vocational, economic, and ethnic interests rather than political ideologies. But there is a difference between them.

It can be shown from a study of American history that the Republican Party, and its forebears, the Whig and Federalist, have been largely and sometimes almost exclusively concerned with the protection of private property interests. In the 18th and early 19th centuries, when the concept of property was based upon the ownership of land and the mechanisms of a mercantile economy, the Federalists and Whigs dominated the landed gentry and the wealthy merchants.

Later, during the dynamic 19th century industrial expansion the concept of private property became identified with the ownership of factories, mines, and railroads. Thus, after the Civil War it was the powerful industrial and railroad barons who captured the Republican Party and defeated the hopes of Abraham Lincoln.

Finally, during the 20th century, the concept of private property has again shifted under the development of the corporation as the major economic institution. And in this century we have found that the representatives of the major corporations have gained ascendancy in the councils of the Republican Party. The farmer, the small businessman, the worker, the aged and the unemployed may advance their claims only if the budget is balanced to the satisfaction of the dominant business executives.

BELIEVERS IN PRIVATE PROPERTY PRESERVATION

And though some of our opponents in the Republican Party would have you believe otherwise, the Democratic Party is also dedicated to the preservation of private property. The main difference between the two parties in this respect would seem to be that we in the Democratic Party have a broader understanding of the meaning of private property.

The property interests of the corporation are only a segment of the total area of the meaning of property rights. Without a fair price for his commodities, the farmer's property rights become an ironic jest—and a poor one.

Without protection against predatory competition and monopolistic trade practices the property rights of the small businessman are void and meaningless.

Finally, within an economic system in which more and more people are becoming salaried workers, we must recognize that the pattern of property rights must be extended to the right of a worker to secure productive employment, the right of the scholar and the scientist to perform the functions in society.

In thus recognizing a broader definition of property rights the Democratic Party has sought to extend the fruits of democracy to an ever widening number of people. For this reason the Democratic Party continues to attract, in ever increasing numbers, the farmer, the laborer, the small businessman, the intellectual—and all those who look to the future, rather than to the past.

IMPORTANT TASKS CHALLENGE YOUTH

And now, before closing, a few words to you young ladies and gentlemen who are the custodians of the not-so-distant future: The suffrage battles of the 19th century have been won. And many of the critical economic issues of the 20th century have been solved. But much remains to be done today—and history will see to it that there will be ample tasks for your generation tomorrow.

Yet it is not heartening to learn that only one-third of the young men and women between ages 21 and 35 bother to vote, in comparison to two-thirds of the middle-aged and three-fourths of those 60 years and older. To some extent your elders and instructors have failed you by not communicating the meaning of democratic responsibilities. But in a larger sense, if you are among the eligible who do not or will not vote, you have failed yourselves and your community. It is not another's responsibility to lead you by the hand. It is your responsibility and yours alone to learn the meaning of democracy and to give substance to that meaning as a free individual. And to be free, to be truly free, means to be free of ignorance and apathy as well as fear.

This, then, is the first injunction your times lay upon you: To seek, to explore, and to learn the meaning of democracy. Then on the basis of reasoned evaluation—not from habit or inertia—and only partly from self-interest—to make your choices and to take part in the great dialogue of democracy.

The foremost, and the final, issue for each of you is to make your life significant—to participate, at whatever level, in the destiny of your times—and regardless of party affiliations—to make your weight felt for truth and justice and the dignity of the individual.

International Cultural Exchange

OF

HON. JACOB K. JAVITS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, January 7, 1960

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, the fine results of our cultural exchange program in promoting international good will have been a revelation to all. The performing arts, at home and abroad, are a crown of our cultural life and achievement. For 75 years without fanfare, the American Academy of Dramatic Arts has gone on quietly providing sound and inspirational training in this field. President Eisenhower took note of the celebration of this birthday by sending a commendation. I ask unanimous consent to have the text of his telegram printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, D.C., October 2, 1959.

Miss FRANCES FULLER,
President, Director, American Academy of Dramatic Arts:

It is a pleasure to join in the observance of the 75th anniversary of the American Academy of Dramatic Arts.

This institution has provided training for a distinguished company of artists in the finest tradition of the American theater. With encouragement and discipline, it has helped them to develop their talents for the benefit of a great audience.

Congratulations and best wishes.

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

Address by Hon. Thomas H. Kuchel Before National Convention of National Rivers and Harbors Congress

OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, January 7, 1960

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL], speaking before the 46th National Convention of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress in Washington, D.C., on May 14, 1959, made some very challenging remarks. I ask unanimous consent that the address delivered by him on that occasion be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GREETINGS OF U.S. SENATOR THOMAS H. KUCHEL TO THE 46TH NATIONAL CONVENTION OF THE NATIONAL RIVERS AND HARBORS CONGRESS, THURSDAY, MAY 14, 1959, MAYFLOWER HOTEL

Mr. Chairman, it gives me great pleasure to greet you this morning and to welcome you to the Nation's Capital.

We have much in common. You are concerned with water resources and their sound utilization in behalf of all Americans. I share this concern, although I am certain you will forgive me for what may appear to you to be a sometimes parochial interest in the needs of my own State.

In most parts of the country, water is something that is there when and where it is needed, and people simply take it for granted. But to those of us who live in the West, the scarcity of water has been and remains a chronically serious condition that needs constant attention.

California is one of the 17 States generally defined as belonging to the semiarid West. In our part of the continent, water is and always has been the key to survival. Not long ago, a distinguished American historian from Senator JOHNSON's famed State declared that the greatest unifying force in the West has been the great American Desert.

Very early in this century, President Theodore Roosevelt signed the Federal Reclamation Act into law. Since the beginnings of that Act, the Federal Government in cooperation with the States has sought the means and techniques needed to meet the ever-increasing demands of the States with the greatest water scarcity.

Storage facilities have been built to conserve the erratic runoff of melting snow water. Great dams have been built, and a natural byproduct, hydroelectric power generation, has followed from these storage dams and reservoirs.

I have said in the Senate and in my State many times that the people of California are indebted to the Federal Government. The Central Valley project represents the difference between economic life and death in the two central valleys. In southern California where my home is, we are indebted to the great Hoover Dam, which was fought through the Senate years ago by the late great Hiram Johnson, who fought against tremendous odds in order finally to win approval by the Senate, and thereafter by the House of Representatives, of a gigantic multipurpose structure which today brings water and hydroelectric power into almost every area of southern California.

But our needs are very great. There must be an assured supply of water for people in our cities and for industrial use. There must be water for irrigation and for the expansion of industry. Since 1940 the West has experienced the greatest population growth of any part of the Nation. It most likely will continue to experience this expansion for many years to come.

It is anticipated that the population of the United States will increase to 225 million people by 1975. Water needs will skyrocket from 185 billion gallons a day in 1950 to 450 billion gallons by 1975. Can there be any doubt that meeting this demand is the proper concern of all Americans?

Spectacular developments may come in finding an economically sound method of converting sea water into fresh water. If so, we may find the earth capable for the first time in human history of providing enough food for all its inhabitants.

Your organization plays a vital role in stimulating a continuing interest in water resources. From your interest may emerge the solution to problems such as that confronting the semiarid West and perhaps, thereby, the solution of water problems on a worldwide scale.

If Peace Were To Break Out

OF
HON. LEONARD G. WOLF
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 7, 1960

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, today in America, and perhaps throughout the world, the question of the economic effects on the world of a permanent peace is being considered. My good friend and distinguished colleague from Colorado, Mr. BYRON L. JOHNSON, was the author of a very thought-provoking article on this subject which appeared in the December 9, 1959, issue of the Christian Century. Because some Members may have missed this interesting article, I take this opportunity to commend it to them for serious reading at the beginning of this new decade in American history:

IF PEACE WERE TO BREAK OUT—A CONGRESSMAN FROM COLORADO ARGUES THAT THE UNITED STATES CAN DISARM WITHOUT PRODUCING A COLLAPSE IN THE AMERICAN ECONOMIC SYSTEM

(By Hon. BYRON L. JOHNSON, of Colorado)

The current discussion of disarmament carries a tragic undertone. The fearful ask, "Won't this cause a depression?"

The United States is currently spending $46.4 billion on its military program at home and overseas, encompassing mutual security, atomic energy, military construction, and the regular appropriation for the Defense Establishment. This represents almost 10 percent of the annual gross national product which amounted to $484.5 billion in the second quarter of 1959. The national income in the second quarter of 1959 was reported at $403.9 billion.

The Defense Establishment employs directly the 2,525,000 people who are in uniform and a civilian force of 947,600; defense production employs a comparable number. The economy of many communities is tied to defense establishment and defense production. It is not surprising therefore that many citizens express concern that disarmament would eliminate as many as 5 million jobs. They fear that disarmament would cause a severe depression. The persistence of this fear is indicated by the number and variety of audiences that have asked me about the consequences of disarmament. It does no good to argue that our national policy is not decided entirely by our own answers to the question raised by the prospect of demilitarization. The existence of the fear of economic collapse is a fact, and this fact is bound to influence the attitudes of the public and of some policymakers.

I

The fundamental question which must be answered first is this: Are the fears justified? If peace should break out, will there be a new depression? Perhaps you have also wondered about this question. As it happens, I have two reasons for answering the question with an unqualified "no." My first reason is basically personal, for I had to examine the disarmament issue—a very live one at the time—in 1944 as a Budget Bureau staff member. My second reason arises out of my work as an economist and a student of national income. Modern economists know what steps to take to adjust the economy of the United States to the cessation of war production and to general disarmament—and they know how to do this with a minimum of dislocation.

Let's first take a look at economic theory and then go back to examine economic history. Our annual national income is the total result of all the effective demands for goods and services in the market in the course of a year. This demand comes in part from households—for food, clothing, shelter, entertainment, medical care, transportation, etc. It comes from the business community in its demand for goods and services, both consumable supplies and capital plant. Finally, it also comes from government in the effective demand for public service at the local, State, and Federal level. This includes the demand for personal service, new capital plant, materials, and supplies.

Any sharp reduction in the demand of any one of the three sectors—consumers, business, government—without a compensating adjustment in the other two will trigger some recession in economic activity. Similarly, a sharp increase in the effective demand for goods and services in any of these sectors without an offsetting adjustment in another sector precipitates expansion in the economy. This expansion will normally take the form of increased output. If, however, the economy is fully employed, then to attempt to expand one sector without cutting back another tends largely to create price inflation, rather than to increase total output.

The war period, 1939 to 1945, was a perfect illustration of the inflationary situation. The Federal Government increased its demand for goods and services in astronomical amounts without raising taxes by a like amount. Much of the money which it created to help finance the war was new money created by the banking system. The new money first triggered a recovery from the depression; then when full employment was reached in 1942, it set in motion a significant inflationary pressure.

Let's now take a quick look at the reverse of the process, using the period from 1945 to 1948 as our test case. Total Federal expenditures for all national defense activities amounted to $81.2 billion for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1945. While studying this period early in 1944, I thought it easy to predict what would happen. There were more than 12 million persons in the Armed Forces; it was assumed that most of these would be discharged, and that at least 8 or 9 million persons employed directly in war production would be released from their jobs.

The consequences of peace seemed obvious to almost every economist in Washington with whom I talked at the time. With impending sharp budget cuts and with almost 20 million people to be cut off from their war-related source of income, numerous authorities estimated that the level of unemployment would rise very sharply within 6 to 9 months after the end of the war. The most optimistic expected 6 million unemployed; the pessimistic prophesied more than 12 million unemployed. It was recognized that the GI bill of rights, then being developed, would remove a few of the veterans from the labor market and put them in school. It was expected that some of the aged entitled to retirement would retire, and that some of the working wives would go back into the kitchen. (For some reason, our statistics on labor do not count housewives as employed persons unless they are paid by someone other than their own husbands.)

The businessmen had been queried as to how long it would take them to reconvert from wartime to peacetime production, and had replied that it would be a long period of transition—from 90 days to 9 months. Under these circumstances, some businessmen and economists fearfully foretold that the United States would experience a major recession following the end of World War II.

In 1944, it was difficult for many people to imagine a total Federal budget much larger than $20 billion. A few had predicted that the postwar budget might reach $25 billion. The Federal budget for all purposes in 1939 was $7.9 billion; a $15 billion to $20 billion estimate therefore seemed a high figure indeed. (In actuality the Federal budget after the war never fell below the 1948 figure of $33 billion.)

President Truman, you will recall, instructed Secretary of Defense Louis Johnson to bring the military budget down sharply, and Johnson complied. The Federal budget was cut by two-thirds in 3 short years. The Bureau of the Budget reports that total Federal spending was reduced from $98.4 billion in 1945 to $33.1 billion in the fiscal year of 1948—a reduction of $65.3 billion. Major national security programs were reduced from $81.2 billion in 1945 to $11.8 billion in 1948—a reduction of $67 billion or about 86 percent. Total military personnel on active duty was reduced from 12.3 million on June 30, 1945, to 1.5 million on June 30, 1948. The table below summarizes these facts year by year:

TABLE I.—Military budget and personnel, 1945–48

Fiscal year	Federal expenditures for major national security functions	Military personnel on active duty June 30
1945	$81,216,000,000	12,294,647

1947	14,368,000,000	1,601,683
1948	11,771,000,000	1,465,773

II

What about the depression? Where was the depression? What happened? The table shows what happened by quarters for the period from V–E Day through 1948 to the gross national product, to the number of employed and to the number of unemployed.

Remember the wartime book in which a Vice President suggested a postwar goal of 60 million jobs? At the time the cynics hooted in derision. But Henry Wallace was really a piker; we had more than 60 million civilian jobs by June of 1947. Unemployment never reached the levels we feared.

How did this development take place? What became of the prophets of doom and gloom of 1944 and 1945? What happened to the warworkers who said on V–J Day, "I suppose this means I lose my job?"

In the first place, the businessmen converted from war to peace more rapidly than they had anticipated they would. In the second place, the backlog of demand by consumers for goods began to express itself immediately. Third, the tremendous supply of liquid assets (Government bonds, cash, savings accounts) in the hands of consumers and businesses provided funds with which they promptly sought to buy more goods and services. Specifically, total bank loans amounted to $28 billion on June 30, 1945, while those for August 26, 1959, were estimated at $129 billion. This represents an increase of 460 percent. In other words, all elements of the American economy—consumers, businesses, and government—worked together to employ additional resources for producing the goods and services desired in peacetime, and this outpouring of effective demand accelerated the process of reconversion. The warworkers found peacetime jobs. Many servicemen found satisfactory employment; others returned to school. Some housewives went back into the kitchen, and some of the aged retired.

Does this experience have any meaning for our present situation? I am reminded by the fearful that our circumstances today are not identical. For example, there has been no rationing, no priorities on housing, and no credit restraint. Many circumstances associated with World War II do not now pertain. Yet this is not the whole story.

While there has been no rationing or priorities to limit output, we still have not built enough houses to keep up with the growth of population and the loss of houses that comes with obsolescence, fire, slum clearance, and new highways. Business firms, in face of the high interest rates now prevailing, have not extended their capital plants as freely as many of them would like. We still have shortages of municipal waterworks, sewage treatment plants, and hospitals for our rapidly growing urban population. Every householder can think of a number of things he would like to buy if he had the necessary income.

We financed much of World War II by borrowing, so that postwar cuts in spending did not permit an immediate cut in taxes. We are financing this year's national budget entirely out of taxes. Therefore, if we could now reduce the level of spending, we could simultaneously reduce the level of Federal taxes. This would immediately increase the funds available to consumers and to business firms for new purchases of capital items and other goods and services.

I am sure all of us would be very happy to have a tax cut. Everyone can quickly think of the things that, as a result of this cut, he would buy with the extra income left in his pocket. Interest rates ought to come down at the same time; then State and local governments would increase their construction of the necessary public facilities.

Thus, if peace were to break out, it would not require a major effort on the part of the Federal Government to restore prosperity. But if such an eventuality did require Federal action, the form of the action would not be hard to imagine. We are now using grants-in-aid in fairly large amounts to build highways. A generous increase in grants-in-aids for public construction would give rise to substantial additional employment.

Similarly, an expansion of Federal services in the fields of health, education, welfare, and recreation would be most welcome. It goes without saying that one of our greatest needs today is the construction of adequate school plant facilities to meet the vastly expanded and still skyrocketing pupil enrollments. And some demographers claim that our population will double in the next 50 years. An acceleration of the present program of urban renewal would permit us to revitalize the American cities now decaying at their core.

III

Finally, if peace were to break out, we should certainly devote a larger portion of our national income to the works of peace. These include greater participation in the education and development of the so-called underdeveloped economies. A program of overseas investment would help provide constructive employment for millions of Americans, both at home and abroad.

More liberal and expanded foreign trade would be another part of this adjustment to peace. Business and agriculture must increasingly produce goods for foreign countries. The more Americans buy from other countries, the more other countries will be able to buy from us.

The results of disarmament therefore should be these: (1) a more peaceful world; (2) the devotion of a larger portion of our national budget to constructive and creative public services; (3) the expansion of the commercial sector of the American economy to provide a wider variety and a more generous supply of goods and services for the people of America and of the world; (4) a higher standard of living for the American consumer; (5) an international campaign to eliminate hunger, disease, illiteracy, and poverty from the face of the earth.

If peace were to break out, there should be a new era of prosperity, here and elsewhere. History is on our side in this argument. If peace should break out, if disarmament should come, and we still fail to accomplish these goals, it will be because we do not have the will to accomplish them.

The necessary financial and economic institutions and techniques are available But they will only be used if we have the wisdom, the faith, and the courage to use them. Every constructive step toward a more abundant life deserves our support. The fearful and those of little faith may be among the real stumbling blocks to the accomplishment of the new opportunities of peace. Be ye numbered not among them. Let history, logic, and faith sustain you in undertaking and pursuing the paths of peace.

The Farm Problem Can Be Solved With the Soil Bank Withdrawal Plan

OF
HON. BEN F. JENSEN
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 7, 1960

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, on November 16 I wrote President Eisenhower as follows:

President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I am sure you remember well when in August 1952 you called me to your western campaign headquarters in the Brown Palace Hotel at Denver, Colo., to debate the question of 90-percent supports for the six basic crops—corn, wheat, cotton, tobacco, peanuts, and rice versus flexible supports; and almost immediately afterward you announced in your speech at Kansas City that you were for 90-percent supports, at least, so long as that law, which was then in effect, and would be in effect until 1954.

After the flexible parity supports was made law in 1954, it was necessary for the corn and wheat farmers to not only increase their acres, but also to fertilize to the hilt in order to produce enough bushels of cash crops, corn and wheat, in order to have enough dollars to pay increased operating costs—higher machinery costs, taxes, etc.—in the diversified farming section of the United States, "the breadbasket of America." Now, as we all know, since 1954 our corn and wheat surpluses have mounted year after year, which was inevitable under the farm program which has been in effect since 1954, to the end that the costly price depressing surplus of corn for example, has had the effect of not only forcing down the price of corn, but has taken hog, cattle, and poultry prices down, down with it; and unless we put into effect a program which will effectively reduce our staggering corn surplus held by the CCC which now hangs dangerously over the head of all our corn and livestock farmers of the breadbasket of America, nothing can stop the further decline in such prices, and the end result can only be complete disaster for our farmers, and finally for our entire national economy. Let us never forget for a minute that all new wealth springs from the soil, is mined or pumped out of the bowels of the earth, or is fished out of the waters, in the form of raw products, on which every American must depend for employment in producing, transporting, processing, marketing or using the finished product. Also, since that is a fact, it is plain to see our economic growth can only be soundly generated from its source, and our farmers always spend over twice as many dollars, when his dollar is worth 100 cents at the counter, than the rest of us Americans spend on an average for manufactured commodities made by the wage earners of the United States.

Were it not for the fact that we have for the past several years been spending over $40 billion for military purposes, which has in effect created here an artificial prosperity, generated from the top (but which we cannot forever endure) the overall economic effect of our farmers' 80-cent dollar has been offset by employment in the manufacturing of military supplies of every nature; while sound, deep-thinking Americans everywhere are asking, "What will the harvest be if farming, our basic industry, goes down the drain?" Disaster for all, will be our lot.

Now, Mr. President, there is an answer. You had that answer in your address to Congress on January 9, 1956, when the Soil Bank Act was afterward made law, but without your recommendation that it be financed with commodities already owned and paid for by the Government; but your recommendation was ignored, as you well remember. Had your recommendation of 1956 been made law at that time, our farmers would not be in the squeeze they find themselves today. You are no doubt aware that the American Farm Bureau Federation in its convention at Boston, Mass., last December affirmed its support of the soil bank program to retire land from production with payments in kind (in corn and wheat, for instance) from Government stocks for participation in the soil bank program. You will, I am sure, be greatly interested in reading the Soil Bank Withdrawal Plan by Mr. Dave Livingston, our mutual farmer friend of Washington, Iowa, in which he gives facts and figures which prove that by paying very liberally in kind, we can solve the farm problem for the livestock and grain farmers, quickly and effectively.

Respectfully,

BEN F. JENSEN.

THE SOIL BANK WITHDRAWAL PLAN

(By Dave Livingston, Washington, Iowa)

Hog prices are now disastrously low. There are now too many hogs. There is an increase of 5 percent in the Corn Belt in the last 3 years.

Poultry prices are also too low and for the same reason.

Cattle feeders have 20 percent more cattle and calves on feed in the 21 major feed in States over a year ago. Thirteen of these States have a record number on feed as of October 1, 1959.

There is only one reason for all of this and that is the fact that there is too much feed available. The only time we have too many animals is when we have too much feed. Livestock numbers always adjust themselves to feed supplies.

There is, therefore, one answer and only one answer to the whole farm problem and that is to find a way to reduce the surplus feed supply without injuring the whole agricultural setup.

The only way this can be done is to set up a Soil Bank Withdrawal Plan whereby the surplus grain, now in the hands of the Government, as the result of accumulation under the soil bank and previous plans, can be withdrawn to pay the rent on feed grain acreage to be put out of production in 1960.

How can this be done?

First of all the Acreage Reserve Section of the Soil Bank Act should be reinstated for a period of at least 3 years. There never was anything wrong with the Soil Bank Act that could not have been corrected by stopping cash rental payments and paying the rent in grain on a realistic basis of using one bushel of surplus to stop the production of one bushel of new crop.

This would return feed grains to acreage allotments as they were at the close of 1958. In other words, we would start over again where we left off at the end of 1958 but this time we would use the grain surpluses for money to eliminate the surpluses. To quote from President Eisenhower's speech to Congress on January 9, 1956, when the Soil Bank Act was introduced, "It will be financed with commodities already owned and paid for by the Government. Time and shrinkage, storage and other costs are eroding away the present value of these stocks." To quote again:

"There are virtues in the plan.

"It will reduce the massive and unproductive storage costs on Government holdings—costs that are running into a million dollars a day.

"It will reduce the crushing burden of surpluses, the essential precondition for the successful operation of a sound farm program.

"It will provide an element of insurance since farmers are assured income from the reserve acres even in a year of crop failure.

"It will ease the apprehension of our friends abroad over our surplus-disposal program.

"It will harmonize agricultural production with peacetime markets." Unquote.

The same situation obtains now as at the time this original plan was introduced and the above quotes fit the present situation precisely.

Each year beginning in 1960, 10 percent of the corn acreage allotments, as they existed in 1958, should be set aside and seeded and the rent on these acres paid with corn out of Government storage. Beginning with the oldest corn in storage (1952) this offer would be on the basis of 100 percent of the rated yield for each farm on the ASC listing at the county office. If your farm was rated at 80 bushels per acre, then you would be offered 80 bushels of 1952 corn for each acre you seeded down in 1960. When the 1952 corn was gone, then 1953 would be used and so on until all the corn in bins in this county was used up. Of course, the 1952 corn would not have the feed value of new corn, which you would raise, but on the other hand, you would not have the cost of plowing, disking, harrowing, planting, cultivating and harvesting. Therefore, it would be a pretty good deal for any farmer aside from the fact that he would be assisting in the elimination of the greatest problem we have in agriculture today.

It would be voluntary. No farmer would be forced to participate. Each year every farmer would be allowed to bid acreage between 10 and 25 percent of his acreage allotment to put under the plan. This would give each farmer a chance to place whole fields under the plan. In case there were more acres bid than there was corn to go around, then "First come, first serve" just as the conservation reserve is handled now.

All this requires no new law, no new organization and no new expense. All that is required is an extension of an old law to be administered by the ASC committees to use up the corn now owned by the Government. All that is required is to spell out the details more clearly, some imagination and determination and probably some new faces at top levels. To quote again from the President's speech, "It will help remove the crushing burden of surpluses, the essential precondition for the successful operation of a sound farm program."

Now take a look at Washington County. Let's see what would happen. This same analysis can be made for the other counties too.

Amount of corn in storage in Washington County by years:

	Bushels
1953 and older	967,509
1954	111,976
1955	87,660
1956	144,090
1957	11,499
1958	11,819
Total	1,334,553

Total corn acreage 1958, 180,558.

Average yield per acre, 71.1 bushels.

This means then that we would take this corn in storage and offer it in Washington County at the average rate of 71.1 bushels per acre to get 10,855 acres of Washington County farmland out of production in 1960. Your allotment would vary one way or the other from the 71.1 figure depending on the rating of your farm in the ASC office. If you wanted to participate you would sign up next spring for the number of acres you would be willing to put under the plan (between 10 percent and 25 percent of your allotment) and then you would get your corn in October in payment.

If you take 10,855 acres out of production at 71.1 bushels per acre then you come up with 771,790 used up in 1960 as money and taken from Government bins and no new corn will be raised to take its place. It would get rid of nearly 80 percent of the 1952 and 1953 corn in this county. And that corn would not have to be shipped away or handled except to get it to the farms in this county. Do the same thing again in 1961 and all the corn in Washington County, now in Government bins, would be used up.

THE STATEWIDE PICTURE

Take a look at the totals for the State of Iowa and here is what you come up with:

1953 and older	67,658,715
1954	24,114,592
1955	36,752,156
1956	47,529,442
1957	13,547,009
1958	9,113,128
Total	198,715,042

Total corn acreage, 1958, 9,979,258.

Average yield, approximately 56 bushels.

Put 10 percent out of production in 1960, 997,925 acres.

At 56 bushels per acre, 56 bushels.

Number of bushels used in 1960, 55,883,800.

When that 55 million bushels is gone it is gone. No new bushels will be raised under this plan to replace them and it costs no new money.

On November 25, 1959, I received the following reply from the President:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, November 25, 1959.

The Honorable BEN F. JENSEN,
Member of Congress,
Exira, Iowa.

DEAR BEN: I have your letter and I shall have your suggestion studied seriously; later you will receive a report of the results.

Sincerely,

DWIGHT EISENHOWER.

Mr. Speaker, just as soon as I can get reprints made of this speech I will send copies to all farm magazines in the United States, many newspapers and radio stations, to hundreds of people in and outside of my district, to Members of Congress, including every member of the Senate and House Agriculture Committees.

Now, Mr. Speaker, surely every unbiased, thinking American, including every Member of Congress is concerned about the farm problem and are anxious to have an early, effective, economical solution to it, which can be accomplished with the soil bank withdrawal plan, if Congress does its duty, and quickly.

William C. Hull, Executive Assistant to the U.S. Civil Service Commissioners, September 23, 1891, to December 23, 1959

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. B. CARROLL REECE
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 7, 1960

Mr. REECE of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, when I came to Washington in 1921 as a young Member of Congress, one of the men in the Civil Service Commission who was very understanding and always ready to render any service within the limits of the civil service regulations was William C. Hull, the executive assistant to the U.S. Civil Service Commissioners, a position to which he had been appointed under the administration of Woodrow Wilson, and it was with much sadness that I learned of his passing.

Mr. Hull had served during administrations of 9 Presidents and under 30 of the 48 Civil Service Commissioners in the 76-year history of CSC. The occasion of his golden anniversary in Federal service was marked informally by CSC officials and employees in September 1958, with a reception at which Harris Ellsworth, then Chairman of the Commission, paid tribute to Mr. Hull on behalf of the CSC staff.

All but 3 weeks of Mr. Hull's long service had been with the Civil Service Commission. He entered Federal service on September 18, 1908, with the Patent Office, serving there until October 3 of the same year. On October 5, 1908, he started work as a messenger at $360 a year for the Commission. He became executive assistant to the Commissioners on October 18, 1917.

Mr. Hull's long and able service brought him many commendations. Among them was a golden anniversary salute from Representative JOHN L. MCMILLAN, Democrat, of South Carolina, in an extension of remarks printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. "I think every Member of Congress who has had occasion to transact any business with the Civil Service Commission during the time he or she has been a Member of Congress, will agree with me that Mr. William Hull, who has so ably served for a number of years as executive assistant to the Commission, is one of our most outstanding public servants," Representative MCMILLAN said. "Because of his experience accumulated over the years and his close associations with Commissioners, he is a frequent and authoritative source of information to Members of Congress, high-ranking department and agency officials, representatives of union and veteran groups."

The Commission gave formal recognition to his many contributions to the Federal service by presenting him a special citation for outstanding devotion to the public service at the Commission's diamond anniversary awards ceremony on January 16, 1958. He was named "civil servant of the year" by AMVETS in 1959.

Despite his long and distinguished career with the Civil Service Commission, which reflected great credit upon the civil service, he never worried about titles or grades for himself and at the time of his death he still held a grade 14, although he was assistant to the U.S. civil service Commissioners. His one great interest was upholding the dignity and integrity of the civil service itself and interesting himself in seeing that other employees were justly recognized.

A native of Arlington County, Va., Mr. Hull was long active in community affairs. He served on the boards of trustees of the Arlington Community Chest and Arlington Hospital Association and as vice president of the latter, and as secretary of the Leeway Citizens Association. He has been a delegate to the Arlington County Civic Federation and to the Inter-Federation Council, during this time serving as president of the federation and chairman of the council. He was also a charter member of Lodge 32 of the American Federation of Government Employees and a member of Local No. 2, National Federation of Federal Employees.

He is survived by his wife, Gladys, of their home, 2255 North Powhatan Street, Arlington; two daughters, Mildred Page, Annandale, and Marguerite Oakley, Arlington; two brothers and four sisters to whom, I know, my colleagues join in an expression of deep sympathy.

Peace and Jobs for 1960

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAMUEL S. STRATTON
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 7, 1960

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, as the 86th Congress moves into the second session the thoughts and attention of all of us are focused, of course, on the underlying goals and objectives of this legislative period.

In that connection, just before leaving to come to Washington, I released to the people of my district a statement of my own views on the major goals and objectives of this session, and under leave to extend my remarks, I include this statement:

At the start of this second session of the 86th Congress I want to express again to all the people of our district my sincere thanks for the honor of serving as your representative in Washington during the past year.

Many complex and controversial items of legislation confront us in 1960. But two tasks stand out as particularly urgent and important.

First and foremost is the need for more jobs. Congress must pass pending legislation to deal with localized, chronic unemployment such as we have been having in so many parts of our district—especially unemployment directly caused by unfair, low-wage competition from abroad. Besides that we need to make sure that New York, as an established industrial State, is not placed at any disadvantage in attracting new productive facilities or in obtaining our fair share of Government and defense contracts.

Second, we must leave no stone unturned in trying to translate into hard reality the new hopes for some easing of world tensions stimulated by President Eisenhower's recent 11-nation tour. Since in today's world a secure and lasting peace must rest on effective deterrent military power, Congress must also insist that America refuse to accept any second-best consolation prize in the vital race for missile development and the control of space.

Actually jobs and a sound peace go hand in hand. For only by insuring that American productive machinery calls on the full energies of all our citizens can we really make our best contribution to a better, more prosperous, and more peaceful world.

In working in the coming year for these two major goals I sincerely believe that I will be serving not only the best interests of our district but of our Nation.

May I wish all of you a peaceful and prosperous New Year.

The Corn Tassel as U.S. Floral Emblem

OF
HON. ALBERT H. QUIE
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 7, 1960

Mr. QUIE. Mr. Speaker, these days there are many decisions Congress is required to make. There are many steps which Congress has an obligation to take. There are many questions Congress is bound to deliberate for the well-being of the country and its people. At the outset, I will say that the question of a floral emblem does not stand in the highest rank in order of priority. But this fact does not make selection of an emblem a lighthearted, gay, jocular pastime for the Congress. It is about the selection of an emblem that I speak today.

I bring it up at this time, Mr. Speaker, because in recent weeks the subject of a floral emblem has been mentioned. Much has been made over the various positions held by advocates of certain flowers, shrubs, and plants. Contradictory views have been expressed over the relative beauty of proposed flowers and growths. I believe that if we decide to take the time to consider an emblem we should give this subject the full deliberation it deserves. For that reason, I have a few remarks dealing with what I believe to be the qualities desired in an emblem.

I believe that selection of an emblem is more important than any ordinary beauty contest. A national emblem is, after all, a symbol of our entire country, its people, its past, and its qualities of character as it faces the future.

For that reason, I believe that the entire nature of a plant—its identification with and importance to America—should be taken into consideration. A Minnesota woman, Miss Margo Cairns, of Minneapolis, has long pointed out the desirability of the corn tassel as our national emblem. She has cited the fact that corn has been identified with America, that it was literally the major crop of the Indian as well as the pioneers, and that our history is replete with examples of human dependency on corn.

Miss Cairns has written:

A national floral emblem must also be distinctively and wholly American. It, too, must be a symbol of the land, the Nation, its people, its history.

1. It must be of American origin, born in the Western Hemisphere, and found nowhere else before 1492.

2. It must have its roots in every State, unifying the Nation.

3. It must serve the Nation, and it certainly has served it well from the first landings on the Atlantic coast to the present.

4. It must not be a flower of mere prettiness, but possess the rare beauty of practicality, or productivity.

5. Its choice as a national floral emblem should be based on gratitude for what it has been, is, and always will be to the people of the United States—a true symbol of this Nation.

Because corn is identified with our heritage, I believe it should be given serious consideration whenever the Congress takes upon itself the matter of a national emblem.

A Typical Story of People Helping People Through Encouraging Thrift Is Symbolized in the 35-Year Career of Myron H. Fox

OF
HON. HAROLD R. COLLIER
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 7, 1960

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, in a day and age when sound financial institutions are the key to the economic strength of each community as well as the entire Nation, it seems fitting and proper that tribute be paid to those who have played a vital role in this field. The Chicago area is certainly one of the most important financial centers in the Nation. Its banks, stock exchange, and board of trade, together with the many savings and loan and building and loan associations, have been a tremendous pillar of strength in the well-being of its million residents.

Let me direct your attention today to some very interesting facts in one specific field of finance which symbolizes the story of people helping people, and to a resident of my congressional district who has devoted 35 years to this program with success.

There are today more than 6,000 savings and loan associations located throughout the United States with total assets of over $60 billion as of December 31, 1959. Three of the Nation's eleven largest savings and loan associations are in the Chicago area. These organizations have been a vital part of our economy since 1831.

What is a mutual savings and loan association? It is a home-financing and savings institution managed by a local board of directors, elected by the association's savings and mortgage members. Such an institution is organized primarily to promote thrift, and to finance the building, purchase, repair, and remodeling of homes.

These savings and loan associations have their own central reserve system in the Federal home loan bank system, and are controlled by Federal and/or State laws.

Since my remarks are properly a tribute to Myron H. Fox, who is the president of one of these great financial institutions—the Bell Savings & Loan Association of Chicago—it is interesting to mark the history of this association as one which reflects all of the principles and values of a mutual savings and loan system.

It was back in 1925 that Mr. Fox and 12 employees of the Illinois Bell Telephone Co. got together and subscribed their personal savings to 5 shares each in a newly formed savings and loan group. This particular group of employees was having a difficult time in securing mortgages for the purchase and construction of homes. Because the need of financing in their particular case was a mutual problem, they decided in the characteristic American fashion to help themselves by pooling their savings.

This was the humble beginning of an institution which originated with a subscribed capital of $6,500 and which today has resources in excess of $250 million and more than 100,000 customers. Its total earnings distributed to customers by the association during the past 35 years, during which Mr. Fox has served the association, has been more than $46 million. In this 35-year period the Bell organization has made more than 50,000 mortgages in the fast-growing Chicago metropolitan area.

A man such as Myron Fox deserves more than mere commendation. His warm understanding of his fellow employees and of the problems of the customer and his keen business sense have served as a beacon light through 3½ decades of the association's steady growth. His confidence in the future and his vision to foresee the tremendous potential growth of the association mark him as one of Chicago's outstanding financial executives.

Mr. Fox frequently refers to himself as the "last of the Mohicans" because he is the only one of the original founders still engaged in its day-to-day management. He often recalls that his first word of encouragement to form the savings group in 1924 came from the late Chicago banker, David R. Forgan, who told him: "Young man, the things that succeed today are those things that are properly managed. If you can assure yourself of obtaining proper management of such an enterprise, it should prove successful."

Mr. Fox recalled that the late Bernard E. Sunny, the then chairman of Illinois Bell Telephone Co., with whom Fox discussed the question of organizing such an association, remarked to him: "You should remember this, if you and your group decide to proceed with the organization of a savings and loan association and it proves successful, everyone will take credit for it, but, if it should fail, no one will be blamed but Mr. Fox."

He now admits that the full meaning of Mr. Sunny's remark takes on added significance as the years go by. It is Mr. Fox's belief that "* * * his words have had a great part in impressing all of us here of our growing responsibilities to each saver, and borrower, and to the community."

Myron Fox was born in Rockford, Ill., December 16, 1894. While Myron was still a small boy, the family moved to Springfield, Ill., and here he attended public school and high school. In 1918 he joined the U.S. Navy as a seaman first class and served 16 months in the European theater.

This month in Chicago Myron Fox steps down from his daily administrative responsibility as president of Bell Savings to the position as chairman of the board of directors. His successor is Harold P. Halleen, whose more than 30 years in the field of finance insure continued excellent management for the association in the future.

Mr. Fox has been vice chairman of the board of directors of the Federal Home Loan Bank of Chicago, is a member of the Board of Savings and Loan Association Advisors to the Department of Financial Institutions, State of Illinois, and a leading figure in other local and national savings and loan activities. As he now takes his place among the industry's elder statesmen, it is encouraging to know that Bell Savings and the entire field of savings and loan management will still have access to his broad practical knowledge and the continuing benefit of his wise counsel.

He and his wife Almah have been residents of Oak Park, Ill., for more than 26 years. They have one married daughter, Mrs. Thomas H. Cloke, Jr., who resides in Glen Ellyn, Ill., with her husband and three children.

Let it be said that Myron Fox is an American in the best and finest sense of the word. He made his own way by virtue of his own abilities and his devotion to high ideals.

He firmly believes that the savings and loan business will continue to grow and he fully expects Bell Savings will grow right along with it. In commenting on this he said: "Our business has made its greatest strides in the past 16 years—the post-World War II period—and as people become more conscious of buying their own homes through savings, the idea of building for the future will become more and more a habit with the American people."

And this, as he himself often remarks, is a clear case of people helping people.

Greed

OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 7, 1960

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, in the closing days of last year a reporter asked me, "Why so many harmful strikes?"

My answer: It may be because those controlling large labor unions, other special groups—veterans, postal employees, farmers—yes, and Congressmen—today, the steelworkers—are never satisfied with what they have. Each group, often individuals, want what might be an unfair share of the national income, of special privileges.

AMBITION

Greed is an acquisitive desire beyond reason. It is not a desirable characteristic. Ambition is an uplifting desire to achieve or obtain, and without it neither the individual nor the Nation would make progress. Without it, we would all become stagnant, never better our individual or national status.

PRESENT TREND

Since coming to Washington, I have observed what seems to me an unfortunate development—laudable ambition displaced by an excessive, acquisitive demand for ever higher wages, salaries, prices, and special privileges, which, granted, injure all.

Politically and financially, powerful pressure groups put the heat on legislators, continually increasing power and incomes for their members, with harmful inflation the result. Naturally, we have always had and probably always will have special groups successfully making such demands. But certainly, if successful demands continue, the disparity between those who have and those who do not will grow wider until finally we may drift back into a situation where a few are inordinately wealthy, privileged, while the many are in dire want and without recourse when a degree of their freedom is taken from them.

Powerful pressure groups from State and Nation—yes, and local governments—are getting more and more for their members, with the result that even today there is just not enough to go around. Illustration: From my district come letters from incapacitated and elderly people, who, because of the high cost of living, have extreme difficulty in obtaining the necessities of life. Result: A high wage, income for the few, little for many.

What we all apparently forget is that, if, for example, today's striking steelworkers are to have an increase in wages and fringe benefits, not only those in the steel industry but all will pay the cost. A part of the cost will fall upon each and every one of us and prices will continue to go up—higher cost of living for the needy.

The same is true wherever in any productive industry wages are increased out of proportion to the increase in production, with the net end result that, while a few receive a special benefit, the additional cost falls upon all. There is an ever-widening gulf between members of a few pressure groups and the great majority. And, quite naturally, those who are on the short end want more.

When increasing salaries, wages, compensation, force the cost of production ever higher, the demand, the ability of all to purchase, grows less—depression threatens.

The answer: We will all be forced to disregard our greed, confine our ambition to limits which will not unduly, ultimately, bring harm to all. What do I mean? Less reliance upon fantastic legislation designed to benefit a few, more compliance with nature's law of supply and demand, and sound economic practices.

Progress is fine but ever-increasing wages, salaries, prices—none are ever through legislation—equitably distributed. Ultimately a disastrous depression. That has been the result every time government has attempted to fix prices, distribute wealth. The Egyptians tried it. The Chinese tried it. The Romans tried it. Other nations made the attempt. No people can ever legislate prosperity, happiness, or contentment. The law of supply and demand, while harsh, ultimately prevails.

Civil Rights: Congress and the Supreme Court

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 7, 1960

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following speech of Senator WAYNE MORSE before the Suffolk University Law School Alumni Association in Boston, Mass., on October 29, 1959:

SPEECH BY SENATOR WAYNE MORSE BEFORE THE SUFFOLK UNIVERSITY LAW SCHOOL ALUMNI ASSOCIATION, BOSTON, MASS., OCTOBER 29, 1959

Mr. Chairman, members of this association, I have chosen as the title for my remarks in response to your kind invitation the subject, "Civil Rights: Congress and the Supreme Court."

Realistic consideration of emphasis and time caused me to omit direct reference to the third constitutional branch of the Federal Government—the Chief Executive and the executive departments—or for the fourth-developed group: administrative agencies, separate administrations, independent boards and commissions, and the like.

Consequently, emphasis is placed upon legislative and judicial duties under our National Constitution in protecting fundamental rights and liberties.

Before I turn to the subject of my lecture, I wish to make an observation concerning our legal profession. My remarks in some respects will not be particularly complimentary of some of the policies and attitudes of the legal profession. There was a time in our history when lawyers as individuals acting through their local bar associations could be counted upon to present a militant front against any invasion or undermining of individual, human, or constitutional rights. This is no longer true to the degree that I think it should be. When I ask myself the question "Why?" I find it difficult to escape from the lurking fear that it may be true that too many lawyers consider themselves private practitioners of the law. I would leave with you the thought that there is in fact no such person as a private practitioner of the law.

If you remember until breakfast time tomorrow nothing that I say today except this point, I will have served a worthwhile purpose in talking to you. The point is this: remember that when you take the oath upon admission to the bar you become forevermore throughout your life in the practice of the law a public officer of the courts. You become a public official in the sense that you are charged with the public responsibility of maintaining a system of government by law. This phrase "government by law" is no empty platitude. It is both the rudder and the propeller of our Ship of State called the Constitution.

As you read the history of the American legal profession, and in reading it you also will be reading important chapters in the evolution of constitutional government in the United States as we have come to know it today, you will take note of the fact that high-principled lawyers of our profession have never considered themselves as the hired men of their clients. They have always recognized their obligations as public officers of the courts. I leave with you the question, "Is the intellectual integrity of our profession threatened today with a tendency on the part of too many lawyers to become the hirelings of their clients? Is it threatened with a tendency to be more concerned with prosecutions that are overturned than with fundamental principles that are upheld?"

It is with that background thought that I move into my subject—"Civil Rights: Congress and the Supreme Court."

When Carl Sandburg wrote about Lincoln's visit to Gettysburg to deliver his epic dedication, he concluded his chapter with the following words:

"[Lincoln] had stood that day, the world's foremost spokesman of popular government, saying that democracy was yet worth fighting for. He had spoken as one in mist who might head on deeper yet into mist. He incarnated the assurances and pretenses of popular government, implied that it could and might perish from the earth. What he meant by a 'new birth of freedom' for the Nation could have a thousand interpretations. The taller riddles of democracy stood up out of the address. It had the dream touch of vast and furious events epitomized for any foreteller to read what was to come. * * *

"For the first time since he had become President he had on a dramatic occasion declaimed, howsoever it might be read, Jefferson's proposition which had been a slogan of the Revolutionary War—'All men are created equal'—leaving no other inference than that he regarded the Negro slave as a man. His outwardly smooth sentences were inside of them gnarled and tough with the enigmas of the American experiment."

Our struggle with those "enigmas of the American experiment" continues today in the courts, in the Congress, in the State legislatures, sometimes even on the streets and in the homes of America. If it is now in a less violent form, it is still as profound and divisive an issue as any of us care to have to deal with in our lifetime.

Out of the conflict of the Civil War came a great turning point in American history and in the history of the human race. The passage of the 13th, the 14th, and the 15th amendments made Jefferson's doctrine a part of our organic law.

I suppose it is not too much to say that in our time we are faced with the problem of making realities of the 14th and 15th amendments. The application of a principle to the realities of daily life, here and now; that is what we are struggling with in the whole debate over civil rights.

Bit by bit and case by case, the Supreme Court has applied those amendments. The cases striking down State-enforced segregation in the public schools should not have been any surprise to anyone familiar with earlier cases striking down federally enforced segregation.

As a lawyer, I am deeply convinced that the preservation of human liberties and civil rights is more dependent upon the courts functioning under the Constitution, including the checks upon the courts to be found within the Constitution, than upon any other branch of our Government.

The great guardian of the Constitution, the legal interpreter of the Constitution, is the Supreme Court of the United States. It is easy for us in the Congress, in the legislative branch of the Federal Government, to assume sometimes that civil rights are for legislative determination. The fact is that Congress does not and cannot create civil rights through legislation; and neither can the courts, for that matter.

Those rights as now existing can change only by constitutional amendment. But it is for the courts to determine the application of the Constitution to particular events and circumstances.

Some in this country would have us think that the Supreme Court has usurped lawmaking powers in striking down State-supported segregation; they would have us think that the Supreme Court has gone amok, has embraced a radical and alien philosophy under which it has exercised a power not rightfully belonging to it.

What is the truth about that allegation? The fact is that the power exercised by the Supreme Court on that occasion dates back to 1803, when a Supreme Court headed by Chief Justice John Marshall handed down its decision in the case of Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch 137 (1803).

Under the doctrine of Marbury v. Madison, that the Supreme Court shall be the final arbiter of the meaning of the Constitution until such time as the people amend the Constitution, the Court has recently struck down a State prosecution by Pennsylvania for subversion against the United States; it has struck down actions by Federal executive officers in denying passports, and executive orders relating to the rights of Federal employees; and it has struck down a contempt of Congress citation against a witness who had refused to answer questions put to him by a congressional investigating committee on the ground the questions were irrelevant to the inquiry.

These decisions caused a great hue and cry in many quarters. They gave rise to the whole bevy of bills that crowded onto the House and Senate Calendars in the closing days of the last session of Congress to punish the U.S. Supreme Court.

Not all of these situations are identical to those under which Chief Justice Marshall and his colleagues acted in 1803. Their case of 1803 concerned an act of Congress only; but the language of their opinion applies equally to the basis for the Court's action overturning State legislatures, and the Federal executive, as well as the Federal legislature.

This is what the Court of 1803 had to say on the question of judicial reviews, and I quote the pertinent sections of Marbury v. Madison:

"The question whether an act repugnant to the Constitution can become the law of the land is a question deeply interesting to the United States. * * *

"That the people have an original right to establish for their future government such principles as, in their opinion, shall most conduce to their own happiness, is the basis on which the whole American fabric has been erected. * * *

"This original and supreme will organizes the government, and assigns to different departments their respective power. It may either stop here or establish certain limits not to be transcended by those departments.

"The Government of the United States is of the latter description. The powers of the legislature are defined and limited; and that those limits may not be mistaken or forgotten, the Constitution is written. To what purpose are powers limited, and to what purpose is that limitation committed to writing, if these limits may, at any time, be passed by those intended to be restrained? * * *

"Certainly all those who have framed written constitutions contemplate them as forming the fundamental and paramount law of the Nation, and consequently the theory of every such government must be that an act of the legislature repugnant to the Constitution is void. * * *

"It is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is. Those who apply the rule to particular cases must of necessity expound and interpret that rule. If two laws conflict with each other, the courts must decide on the operation of each.

"So if a law be in opposition to the Constitution; if both the law and the Constitution must apply to a particular case, so that the court must either decide that case conformably to the law, disregarding the Constitution, or conformably to the Constitution, disregarding the law, the court must determine which of these conflicting rules governs the case. This is of the very essence of judicial duty."

That is the duty the Supreme Court followed in 1954 when it ruled that State segregation laws must fall before the 14th amendment, for Justice Marshall continued:

"If then, the courts are to regard the Constitution, and the Constitution is superior to any ordinary act of the legislature, the Constitution, and not such ordinary act, must govern the case to which they both apply."

I think many of us are being pretty conservative when we defend and commend the Supreme Court and the lower Federal courts for "holding the fort" of constitutional rights against the assaults of Congress, the State legislatures, and the executive branch. We are upholding the same kind of judicial review that was laid down by Chief Justice Marshall a century and a half ago.

At the same time, there is nothing immutable about what the Federal courts have done. Any time the American people want to withdraw the equal protection of the State laws to all citizens, they can do so by repealing the 14th amendment. By the procedures outlined in it they can change their Constitution and with it, the displeasing rulings of the Supreme Court. Several Senators from the South, led by Senator TALMADGE of Georgia, have offered a constitutional amendment to exempt education from the 14th amendment. Of course, I am against that proposal.

Of the thousands of statutes enacted by Congress since its first session in 1789, surprisingly few (less than 80) have been found unconstitutional by the Court. This simple statistical fact can mean several things. One thing it may mean is that Members of Congress do positively consider the constitutional aspects of legislation during the legislative process—when a proposal is first discussed as to aims and objectives, when the bill is drafted, when it is before subcommittee and congressional committee, reported, and debated in both the Senate and the House of Representatives. I think this is a very good thing. I think this is something for which we can all be proud.

But I suggest that the procedure just summarized has not been followed often enough in Congress. Bad legislation, both of unsound public policy and of grave unconstitutionality, has been passed from time to time which a wiser Congress would have rejected. Then, where constitutionality has been an issue, the courts have been the protectors of constitutional rights and liberties. In such cases, the Court has had no choice but to correct errors committed by Congress.

In many instances, the Court is faced with an application of constitutional principles rather than a clear-cut test of constitutionality. In construing statutes, susceptible to various interpretations, the Court must try to apply its understanding of Congress' purpose to the factual and legal situation before it. Then, if Members of Congress disagree—if a majority feels strongly that the Court's interpretation of what Congress meant in the particular legislation is incorrect—Congress may enact new legislation along the lines of this other purpose. This we are called upon to do, from time to time, and I, for one, generally resist such efforts to the utmost, preferring to keep my faith in the Court as the careful guardian of our liberties, particularly when Congress has erred in the first place or the Executive has usurped power never delegated by Congress.

Let us look at a few examples.

Congress, a few years ago, enacted a law to authorize the head of a Government agency to suspend summarily an employee when there was serious question that he might be a security risk. The Court, in Cole v. Young, 351 U.S. 536 (1956), held that this provision applies only to personnel in sensitive positions, not generally to the millions of Government workers in nonsensitive jobs. I think this is a wise and correct interpretation. A hue and cry arose that this decision would lay the Government wide open to mass Communist infiltrations, that Congress meant—or if it didn't so mean when it first passed the Summary Suspension Act, it should now say it meant—to cover all Federal employees, nonsensitive as well as sensitive, park guides and gardeners as well as Defense Department scientists.

In one way, it is encouraging to know that there is substantial opposition to "Cole v. Young repealer" legislation in at least the Senate of the United States. But we should not relax our vigilance; we must continue to be alert and prevent any wholesale, unwarranted extension of Government power, in this and other fields.

The plain truth of the matter is that the Cole v. Young decision has not made the Government vulnerable to Communist subversion. Nothing of the sort is involved. Because, under provision of the 1939 Hatch Act concerning Federal employment, a disloyal person may not be hired nor retained on Federal payrolls. Cole v. Young stands solely for the proposition that Congress did not grant agency or executive department heads the arbitrary power to summarily suspend suspected employees; the power is granted with appropriate restrictness only over personnel occupying sensitive positions with access to properly classified information. Rightly, such arbitrary power must be restricted to apply only where there may be valid grounds for taking such unusual action. Other employees in nonsensitive positions can be dealt with under regular civil service procedures. However, I still think considerable improvement could be made in permitting personnel to be reassigned to nonsensitive positions, awaiting the outcome of determinations concerning their fitness to occupy sensitive jobs. And the Government should always provide adequate appellate review procedures; it seems to me that the holding in the case of Wong Yang Sung v. McGrath, 339 U.S. 33 (1950), is sound legal doctrine for the protection of individual liberties—where there is a hearing, it should be a fair hearing in fact and not merely in name. So, to those who seek to destroy Cole v. Young and make the reasonable distinction between sensitive and nonsensitive positions meaningless, I say: there has been no showing of necessity for such a total expansion of summary-dismissal power.

This brings me to what I think is an extremely important standard to apply to all legislation and particularly proposals affecting the liberties and freedoms of persons in the United States. The yardstick for measuring these suggestions is quite simple, clear and reasonable—namely, "Is this legislation really necessary? What is the purpose? Can this purpose be accomplished in compliance with the basic requirements of the Constitution?" These questions must be answered affirmatively before I shall agree to the proposals. To date, I have not found any of the anti-Supreme Court or anti-Supreme Court-decisions bills can meet these tests satisfactorily. Therefore, I feel Congress has the constitutional duty and responsibility to refuse enactment of unsound, unwise and unconstitutional laws.

Principles of good government and mature legislative responsibilities require, also, that Congress resist hysterical demands made by the executive branch for reversal of Supreme Court decisions. The outstanding example in this category occurred soon after the Supreme Court decisions holding the State Department exceeded its authority in refusing to issue passports to the world-known artist, Rockwell Kent; the California psychiatrist, Walter Briehl; and the cosmic-ray scientist, Weldon Bruce Dayton. The State Department argued the constitutional power of the President to conduct foreign relations carried with it the subordinate power to regulate the travel of U.S. citizens out of, or back into, the United States, in peacetime as well as during war, and that this point of view was accepted by Congress in numerous laws authorizing the Secretary of State to issue passports, and in a provision of the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, dealing with movement of persons—citizens as well as aliens—during an emergency declared by the President. (Such an emergency has been declared by both Presidents Truman and Eisenhower.) The Court refused to accept the asserted powers of the State Department. The Court said Congress had not intended to grant blanket authority to the Secretary of State. The Court held that the Secretary was not justified in claiming power to decide who should receive a passport, under what circumstances, and without adequate opportunity to examine adverse evidence and cross-examine adverse witnesses—particularly since all Americans must have a passport to travel anywhere in the world outside the Western Hemisphere today, by our own laws and by requirements of most of the countries to be visited.

Following these decisions, the State Department promptly issued passports to the three litigants: Kent, Briehl, and Dayton—properly so, I think; State Department compliance with the law in this instance is to be commended. The Department also issued passports to several other U.S. citizens whose applications had been denied, or not acted upon pending the outcome of the Kent, Briehl, and Dayton cases. But shortly thereafter the President of the United States sent a special message to Congress urging that the Secretary of State be granted broad powers to restrict the use of, and to deny, passports to Americans in several different categories. A special message from the White House, urging enactment of specific legislation, is itself an unusual occurrence. In any year, there are only a few special messages, and they are nearly always on subjects of great magnitude. So it is to be assumed that some officials in the executive branch intended to make Members of Congress believe that President Eisenhower himself attached great significance to the request to overturn the Court's passport decisions. Then the language of the message was further designed to emphasize this impression. The message hammered away at the "urgent" need for legislation and spoke frighteningly of the powerlessness of the Government to deny passports to members of the Communist Party "or to those who have had a long and proven record of Communist activities"—whatever that means.

Well, what are the facts?

The Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, of which I am happy to be a member, refused to be stampeded into recommendation of hastily and ill-conceived legislation to impose travel controls on Americans. By now, everyone who had given serious thought to the issues involved was recognizing a constitutional right to travel which was not to be circumscribed by the Federal Government other than in accordance with constitutional requirements of due process of law, necessarily containing the elements of fair-hearing procedures.

The Foreign Relations Committee held public hearings last year and again this year—and, to date, the State Department witnesses have failed to produce evidence of due consequences predicated unless Congress granted the unprecedented power to the Secretary of State. The House of Representatives, in the closing hours of the last Congress, yielded to administration pressures and voted approval of a restrictive bill. But the Senate, respecting the consideration of all legislation on the subject by the Foreign Relations Committee, declined to approve the House bill.

This year, the Foreign Relations Committee has decided there has been no convincing evidence of a need for restrictive passport legislation. And so the matter rests—for the time being. The Senate did not succumb to hysteria, regardless of the powerful position of the Chief Executive invoked by State Department officials.

Does this mean Congress has acquiesced in leaving the country powerless to deal with the Communist conspiracy? Not at all. Nothing of the sort. What is meant is that Congress—at least the Senate of the United States—demands proof of facts of the Communist menace specifically related to travel abroad today by U.S. citizens and a clear demonstration of how governmental controls on that travel are requirements of intelligent national security. The State Department has been given abundant opportunity to prove its case and it has failed to present convincing evidence.

On two other subjects, Federal legislation has been sought in recent years to overcome the effects of Supreme Court decisions in the cases of Mallory v. United States, 354 U.S. 449 (1957) and Pennsylvania v. Nelson, 350 U.S. 497 (1956).

Rule 5(a) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure requires that an arrested person shall be taken "without unnecessary delay" before the nearest available U.S. Commissioner or other officer empowered to commit persons charged with offenses against the laws of the United States. At that time, the Commissioner is required to inform the arrested person of the complaint against him, of his right to retain counsel and of his right to have a preliminary examination. He shall also inform the defendant that he is not required to make a statement and that any statement made by him may be used against him. Obviously, then, if there is an unreasonable delay in taking the arrested person before the committing magistrate, he may have lost meaningful use of his constitutional rights. The Court years ago in McNabb v. United States, 318 U.S. 332 (1943) and recently in the Mallory case, held that a confession is inadmissible if obtained during a period of unnecessary delay. This is a most pointed way for the Court to implement the clear statement of rule 5(a); the Court says to arresting officer, in effect: "You are arresting, not judicial, officers. If you delay unnecessarily in taking an arrested person before a committing official as required specifically by rule 5(a), you will not be permitted to use a confession taken from the person during that time. This is good law. This is in keeping with constitutional principles regarding due process and individual liberties. As most lawyers—prosecutors and defense counsel and judges—are painfully aware, all confessions are suspect, more or less. Yes, our system of jurisprudence permits voluntary confessions to be used against accused persons, but the key qualifier is "voluntary." How many confessions are genuinely voluntary? Police brutality, torture, the third degree, to extract confessions, are condemned in all our State courts and in the Federal system, but subtle means of torture, threats of physical violence, intimidation and coercion, though harder to prove, are just as thoroughly rejected by our courts. I suggest we all realize in our hearts that time alone may be a most insidious means of forcing action which is not a person's actual free choice. For all these reasons, the Court interpretation of rule 5(a) amounts to sound law and good common sense in modern society. The burden is where it should be: on the police and prosecuting officers to prove their case by other means than forcing the conviction out of the mouth of the accused.

We should all be sorry to note that bills have been introduced in both Houses of Congress to overcome the effect of the Court's Mallory decision. It is even sadder to note that some of the sponsors are Members of Congress who should know better, especially since a few of them are pleased to be identified as liberals or advocates of civil rights. Their uneasiness becomes apparent, though, when we examine their accompanying statements, in which they speak of clarifying the Mallory decision and wherein they disclaim any intention of interfering with constitutional rights of accused persons. Well, then, I say: Leave the decisions alone. Leave it up to the police to prove that any delay which occurred was really necessary. Stop trying to encourage the police to relax their respect for constitutional rights; stop trying to make it easier to convict by testimony of a person against himself in place of regular, solid, evidence against him.

I return now to the Steve Nelson case. This case is much simpler than its repealer advocates would have you believe. Simply, the Supreme Court of the United States agreed with the Supreme Court of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania that Pennsylvania is not authorized to prosecute a person for subversive activities against the United States. This, again, is good law and common sense. Why, in the name of anything that is logical, should a State ever be permitted to bring prosecutions for Federal offenses under State procedures, in State courts, under State rules? Do the proponents of such a method really lack faith in the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Federal crime detection, Federal laboratories, Federal prosecutors, Federal judges, Federal courts? Because that is the inevitable conclusion to be drawn from their approach. Many of us are inclined to believe that twisted logic has been at work in connection with the hoary old catch phrase "States rights." Some of the States rights advocates appear to be misleading themselves into feeling that, somehow, if they can succeed in having anti-Federal-preemption laws passed, they will be able to nullify the effect of Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954), and other Supreme Court school desegregation decisions which held racially segregated schools to be in violation of the equal protection of the laws provision of the 14th amendment and therefore unconstitutional. To you in this audience, this may sound farfetched—but I suggest this is involved in the misreading of the Steve Nelson decision.

Incidentally, I would not like to have the impression left that I am blindly an admirer of the Court nor an unreserved critic of several of my colleagues in Congress. I try not to be blind in either my devotion or my criticism. So perhaps this is a good place in my remarks to interject comment that I feel the majority—5 to 4—reached different conclusions than I would have in two cases this year. I think the better constitutional grasp of the issues is expressed by the dissenters in Barenblatt v. United States, 360 U.S. 109 (1959) and in Uphaus v. Wyman, 360 U.S. 72 (1959). The two cases involve legislative investigations—Federal and State—of subversive activities. In each case, the defendant is a private individual, not a public official nor the recipient of public funds. The investigators in each case seek to inquire into the defendant's beliefs and associations. Let me quote from the dissenting opinions.

In dissenting in Barenblatt v. United States, Mr. Justice Black, joined by Chief Justice Warren and Mr. Justice Douglas, summarizes the facts and makes abundantly clear the constitutional issues:

"On May 28, 1954, petitioner Lloyd Barenblatt, then 31 years old, and a teacher of psychology at Vassar College, was summoned to appear before a subcommittee of the House Committee on Un-American Activities. After service of the summons, but before Barenblatt appeared on June 28, his 4-year contract with Vassar expired and was not renewed. He, therefore, came to the committee as a private citizen without a job. Earlier that day the committee's interest in Barenblatt had been aroused by the testimony of an ex-Communist named Crowley. When Crowley had first appeared before the Un-American Activities Committee, he had steadfastly refused to admit or deny Communist affiliations or to identify others as Communists. After the House reported this refusal to the U.S. attorney for prosecution, Crowley voluntarily returned and asked to testify. He was sworn in and interrogated, but not before he was made aware by various committee members of committee policy to make an appropriate recommendation to protect any witness who fully cooperates with the committee. He then talked at length, identifying by name, address, and occupation, whenever possible, people he claimed had been Communists. One of these was Barenblatt, who, according to Crowley, had been a Communist during 1947–59 while a graduate student and teaching fellow at the University of Michigan. Though Crowley testified in great detail about the small group of Communists who had been at Michigan at that time and though the committee was very satisfied with his testimony, it sought repetition of much of the information from Barenblatt. Barenblatt, however, refused to answer their questions and filed a long statement outlining his constitutional objections. He asserted that the committee was violating the Constitution by abridging freedom of speech, thought, press, and association, and by conducting legislative trials of known or suspected Communists which trespassed on the exclusive power of the judiciary. He argued that however he answered questions relating to membership in the Communist Party his position in society and his ability to earn a living would be seriously jeopardized; that he would, in effect, be subjected to a bill of attainder despite the twice-expressed constitutional mandate against such legislative punishments. This would occur, he pointed out, even if he did no more than invoke the protection of clearly applicable provisions of the Bill of Rights as a reason for refusing to answer.

"He repeated these, and other objections, in the district court as a reason for dismissing an indictment for contempt of Congress. His position, however, was rejected at the trial and in the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit over the strong dissents of Chief Judge Edgerton and Judges Bazelon, Fahy, and Washington. The Court today affirms, and thereby sanctions, the use of the contempt power to enforce questioning by congressional committees in the realm of speech and association. I cannot agree with this disposition of the case, for I believe that the resolution establishing the House Un-American Activities Committee and the questions that committee asked Barenblatt violate the Constitution in several respects. (1) Rule XI creating the committee authorizes such a sweeping, unlimited, all-inclusive, and undiscriminating compulsory examination of witnesses in the fields of speech, press, petition, and assembly that it violates the procedural requirements of the due process clause of the fifth amendment. (2) Compelling an answer to the questions asked Barenblatt abridges freedom of speech and association in contravention of the first amendment. (3) The committee proceedings were part of a legislative program to stigmatize and punish by public identification and exposure all witnesses considered by the committee to be guilty of Communist affiliations, as well as all witnesses who refused to answer committee questions on constitutional grounds; the committee was thus improperly seeking to try, convict, and punish suspects, a task which the Constitution expressly denies to Congress and grants exclusively to the courts, to be exercised by them only after indictment and in full compliance with all the safeguards provided by the Bill of Rights."

Mr. Justice Brennan, dissenting, stated:

"I would reverse this conviction. It is sufficient that I state my complete agreement with my Brother Black that no purpose for the investigation of Barenblatt is revealed by the record except exposure purely for the sake of exposure. This is not a purpose to which Barenblatt's rights under the first amendment can validly be subordinated. An investigation in which the process of lawmaking and law-evaluating are submerged entirely in exposure of individual behavior—in adjudication, of a sort, through the exposure process—is outside the constitutional pale of congressional inquiry." Watkins v. United States, 354 U.S. 178, 187, 200; see also Sweezy v. New Hampshire, 354 U.S. 234; NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449; Uphaus v. Wyman, 360 U.S. 72 (dissenting opinion).

In dissenting in Uphaus v. Wyman, Mr. Justice Brennan—speaking for the same strong four—examines the State investigation in this language:

"The Court holds today that the constitutionally protected rights of speech and assembly of appellant and those whom he may represent are to be subordinated to New Hampshire's legislative investigation because, as applied in the demands made on him, the investigation is rationally connected with a discernible legislative purpose. With due respect by my brothers' views, I do not agree that a showing of any requisite legislative purpose or other State interest that constitutionally can subordinate appellant's rights is to be found in this record. Exposure purely for the sake of exposure is not such a valid subordinating purpose. Watkins v. United States, 354 U.S. 178, 187, 200; Sweezy v. New Hampshire, 354 U.S. 234; NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449. This record, I think, not only fails to reveal any interest of the State sufficient to subordinate appellant's constitutionally protected rights, but affirmatively shows that the investigatory objective was the impermissible one of exposure for exposure's sake. I therefore dissent from the judgment of the Court."

I have devoted an appreciable amount of time in these remarks to issues of civil liberties—free speech and association, and due process of law—because I have a deep conviction that procedures are of paramount importance in protecting substantive rights. What of "equal protection of the laws," popularly called "civil rights" in this country ever since the Reconstruction period which saw adoption of the 13th, 14th, and 15th amendments, and enactment of several far-reaching Civil Rights Acts?

The civil rights picture, in my opinion, is not a pretty one. The Court handed down—unanimously—historic decisions in 1954 and 1955, outlawing racial segregation in public education and has since stood fast on this subject, but Congress has been silent. Oh, I know, the Civil Rights Act of 1957 has been hailed as a great achievement: "the first substantial civil rights statute since the days of Reconstruction." But how substantial, really? The record does not disclose that a single American citizen has voted as a direct consequence of the voting provisions of the act of 1957.

The Civil Rights Commission—established by the act—is at best only a study group, however important its suggestions and recommendations may be. Its life was extended, in an offhand way this year, by a nongermane amendment to the foreign aid appropriations bill. I look forward with interest to its further studies and recommendations.

Where does this leave us?

With regard to civil liberties, I think we must continue to oppose restrictive and anti-Supreme Court legislation. This is a resistance action.

With regard to civil rights, I think Congress has a long way to go and must soon enact substantial, meaningful statutes to give effective protection to the constitutional right to vote in Federal elections, and for the constitutional right—for all persons in our great country—to the "equal protection of the laws." This is a noble, positive action, and we should not delay. Our consciences should be pricking us, while the eyes of the world, especially of peoples in Asia and Africa, are upon us. We should get on with the unfinished business of democracy.

Extend Soil Bank, Encourage Gradual Farm Bank To Reduce Overhanging Farm Surplus

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALBERT H. QUIE
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 7, 1960

Mr. QUIE. Mr. Speaker, one of the major responsibilities of this Congress concerns farm legislation. The present overhanging crop surplus constitutes a threat which cuts across every segment of our economy and confronts not only the Nation's farmers but all Americans.

For that reason, I believe that one of the first priorities on the agenda of the Congress is to determine how best to reduce the crop surplus.

One of the Nation's most important farm programs is the conservation reserve, known as the soil bank. This legislation is necessary as one of the most acceptable means of reducing production by placing acres in idleness.

The Soil Bank Act is due to expire. On the opening day of this second session of Congress, I introduced legislation to extend the program for the next 5 years. I believe that we must continue the land retirement program which attempts to balance production with consumption, and in these remarks I would like to detail the various features of this legislation.

The Department of Agriculture has viewed the conservation reserve as an opportunity to remove the greatest number of acres from production with the funds appropriated by Congress. I believe this concept is faulty. To my mind, we should remove not necessarily the greatest number of acres, but the more productive acres, in order to cut down the surplus. An increased effort must be made to retire land of higher productive capacity into the conservation reserve than has been the case in the past. I believe the legislation I have introduced provides the incentive to accomplish this end.

In addition to extending the life of the program for 5 years, my bill would set up a goal for the Secretary of Agriculture of $150 million per year to take in contracts with producers for additional conservation reserve acreage, including cost of materials and services.

Also the bill provides that the Secretary would not "enter into contracts with producers which would result in increasing the number of acres of land in the conservation reserve by more than 10 million acres in any year." This means that it will take from 3 to 5 years for sufficient land to be taken out of production by soil banking entire farms. It is necessary to take this time, so that communities are able to adjust to the program. I believe that this program will be of interest to older farmers who are still active, but planning for eventual retirement.

To my mind, the practice of soil banking entire farms ranks as the most efficient, effective way to cut production. If only a part of a farm is taken out of production, the labor and capital formerly used on the idled portion goes into increased output on the remaining acres.

The practice of retiring whole farms has two great advantages. First, the program is the least expensive one for the taxpayers. Secondly, the program at the same time provides more income to the farmers who will remain in farming.

The legislation I have introduced contains a provision of the 1956 act, to prevent the soil banking of land in reclamation projects and the placing of price supports on any crops raised on such land. I believe that the cost of our farm program could be reduced as well as crop production if vast reclamation projects, bringing new land into production, could be at least temporarily halted.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that this legislation will be endorsed by this Congress and that a program of increasing value to America can continue to operate.

Antitrust Bill To Ban Joint Ownership of Broadcast and News Facilities

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 7, 1960

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a bill in Congress to prohibit the concentration of control of a substantial portion of the radio and television broadcasting facilities and a substantial portion of news publications in any section of the country.

Modeled on the Clayton Act, this bill would add a new section to that act providing that no news publisher shall own or acquire stock or assets of or a license to operate a radio or television broadcasting station where the result would give him control of a substantial portion of the broadcast and news facilities of the section of the country or area. Broadcasting interests would, in similar circumstances, be prohibited from owning or acquiring interests in news publications.

It has recently been revealed that the owners of many important publications are also the owners of TV and radio stations. This raises the entire question of concentration of ownership and control of communications media.

I am convinced that it was never the intention of Congress to sanction the control of radio, and now TV, by newspapers and magazines. Although the Communications Act is silent on this score, the great danger in permitting concentration of a community's media of mass communications in a single ownership is manifest. Newspapers and magazines have always played an influential part in molding public opinion and shaping public policy. Newspapers in this country have enormous power. TV reaches homes to an even greater degree than the press, and perhaps more effectively. Its visual and acoustical penetration is more dynamic than the written word. In any area, the man who controls both press and TV has an inordinate influence over the political, economic, and cultural destiny of that area.

We must ever bear in mind that the strength of democracy lies in the fullness and freedom of exchange in its marketplace of ideas. Limit the availability of ideas and we limit the effectiveness of our political system. Obviously this must be the result where all an area's media of mass communication are concentrated under one ownership or where there is undue concentration of such media in one entity.

The available spectrum for TV broadcasting is limited. Not every qualified applicant can secure a telecasting station. Hence the FCC must allocate the high privilege of telecasting only where the public interest will be served. What is more, the licensing of TV channels should take into account the basic need of a community for varied sources of information and ideas. The fact that newspapers and magazines control many of the leading TV and radio stations of the country makes manifest that the FCC has not given this principle adequate weight. The danger signals have been raised clearly enough for all to see. There must be a change in the standards for licensing new stations and for the renewal of existing licenses. Heretofore, the renewal of licenses has been virtually automatic. This has given rise to the false notion that a license is equivalent to ownership. The public interest requires that the FCC give great weight to the principle of diversity of control of communications media, both in the granting of new licenses and in considering applications for renewals.

I should again like to make it perfectly clear that this legislation is not directed at newspaper ownership of TV and radio per se. It is directed at those situations where the press of a community also controls a substantial portion of the television and radio available to the community. Where the press-owned radio or TV station is only one of many operating in the community, as in the case of the New York Times ownership of WQXR in New York, the bill would effect no change in that relationship.

I should also like to repeat that this bill does not deal with the question of honesty in broadcasting and telecasting raised by the recent congressional hearings. It is my understanding that members of the investigating committee will introduce bills dealing with this problem. In the event that such bills are not introduced, I shall certainly offer appropriate legislation in the forthcoming session of Congress.

The bill would take effect on the 90th day after its enactment.

The text of the bill is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Clayton Act (October 15, 1914, 38 Stat. 730) as amended is hereby further amended by adding after section 10 thereof (38 Stat. 734, 15 U.S.C., sec. 20), a new section 10A, which reads as follows:

"SEC. 10A. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, (a) no person engaged in the publication of a newspaper or newspapers or other news periodicals or periodicals shall own or acquire directly or indirectly the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital or of the assets of any radio or television broadcasting station or shall own or be granted a license to operate any radio or television broadcasting station where such ownership, acquisition, or grant may result in such person controlling the operation of a substantial portion of the radio and/or television broadcasting facilities and the publication of a substantial portion of the newspapers and news periodicals in any section of the country, and

"(b) no person engaged in operating or licensed to operate any radio or television broadcasting station shall own or acquire directly or indirectly the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital or of the assets of any newspaper or other news periodical where such ownership or acquisition may result in such person controlling the publication of a substantial portion of the newspapers and/or news periodicals and a substantial portion of the radio and/or television broadcasting facilities in any section of the country."

2. Section 11 of the Act of October 15, 1914 (38 Stat. 734, as amended; 15 U.S.C., sec. 21) is hereby further amended by substituting for the words "sections 2, 3, 7, and 8 of this Act" wherever they appear, the words "sections 2, 3, 7, 8, and 10A of this Act," and by substituting for the words "sections 7 and 8 of this Act" where they appear, the words "sections 7, 8, and 10A of this Act."

3. The provisions of this Act shall be effective on and after the ninetieth day following the date of its enactment.

Egyptian Piracy Rewarded

OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 7, 1960

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, the World Bank officially announced that it has made an agreement with the United Arab Republic to loan it $56½ million to widen the Suez Canal. The loan was made despite Egypt's anti-Israel blockade and over the protests of 67 Members of the House of Representatives.

The United States is the largest contributor and stockholder of the World Bank. No loan is made without its consent. The U.S. representative, T. Grayden Upton, voted for the loan. Eugene R. Black, American President of the World Bank, arranged the loan. The Eisenhower administration approved the loan on the score that the World Bank does not permit political considerations to influence granting or refusal of loans. Secretary of State Herter reiterated this principle, but no one is so naive as to believe in it.

The administration has conveniently forgotten the pledge that President Eisenhower made in February 1957, when he said that the society of nations should deal firmly with Egypt if Egypt violated the armistice agreement or other international obligations, at the time when the administration was pressing Israel to withdraw from Suez, Sinai and Gaza. He pledged free Suez passage of Israel ships and cargoes.

The World Bank is an arm of the United Nations, which by resolution condemns Egypt and Nasser for refusal to permit Israeli ships to pass through the canal. Thus, the United Nations castigates Egypt, while its agent, the World Bank, gives it comfort. Does morality stop at the entrance to the United Nations? Does the President of the United States approve such immorality?

To add insult to injury, the Eisenhower administration, on December 22, 1959, entered into a new agreement with the United Arab Republic to assist it in the building of a multi-million dollar jet airport at Cairo. The cost will be in the millions. The Federal Aviation Administration will cooperate with the UAR, by sending representatives to Egypt for planning and designing facilities to handle the largest jet planes and to facilitate takeoff and landing problems.

Not only does President Eisenhower's pledge of Suez passage remain unredeemed, but Egypt is handsomely rewarded for her piracy.

Children's Milk Program

OF
HON. LESTER R. JOHNSON
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 7, 1960

Mr. JOHNSON of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I introduced a bill to increase the amount of Commodity Credit Corporation funds which can be used for the children's milk program during the 1960 and 1961 fiscal years. Under the provisions of my bill, the authorization for this program would be increased from $81 to $85 million for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1960, and from $84 to $90 million for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1961.

The increased authorization will be necessary if the children's milk program is to fulfill the bright promise of the program's 6-year history. During the 1954–55 school year, the first that the children's milk program was in operation, 41,094 schools used 449,800,000 half pints of milk. Since that time, both the number of schools participating and the amount of milk consumed have shown a steady and gratifying increase. Throughout the 1958–59 school year, some 80,000 schools and child-care institutions took part in the program, and the children drank 2,175 million half pints of milk.

These figures do not include the summer camps, which became eligible to benefit from the program under the provisions of a bill I introduced and which was enacted into law in 1956. The following year, 2,220 camps participated in the program. By 1958, the number had gone up to 3,026.

Mr. Speaker, as successful as the children's milk program has been during its first 6 years, it still reaches barely half of our Nation's schoolchildren. Nutritionists agree that milk is nature's most nearly perfect food. I feel it is vitally important for the children of our country to be provided with a sufficient amount of wholesome milk in order to strengthen their bodies as they grow to maturity and take their rightful places in our democratic society.

This can hardly be accomplished unless sufficient funds are made available so the children's milk program can keep pace with rising school enrollment as well as encouraging additional schools to join this worthwhile program. For a school which is considering taking part in the children's milk program, nothing could be more discouraging than the fear that the funds for the program might run out in the middle of the school year—or the fear that the reimbursement rate to the schools might be cut.

At the present time, the Federal Government's maximum reimbursement rate to schools which offer milk to children as a separately priced item is 4 cents per half-pint in schools serving type A lunches under the national school program. In schools serving milk but not the lunches, the maximum reimbursement rate is 3 cents per half pint.

Mr. Speaker, I was very disturbed to learn that the funds now authorized for the children's milk program for the 1959–60 school year will not be sufficient to cover the increased number of children and schools participating in the program. As a result, the U.S. Department of Agriculture has announced that, effective March 1, 1960, the maximum reimbursement rate will be cut by half a cent per half pint of milk in both categories.

If the reimbursement rate to schools goes down, naturally the price the schoolchildren or the school districts have to pay for the milk will go up. This will result in a decrease in milk consumption in the schools, particularly among children from low-income families. And they are the children who need the milk the most because they are very likely not getting enough milk at home.

These are not mere conjectures on my part. During the first year the children's milk program was in operation, numerous federally financed research projects were undertaken to discover problems which might hinder the rapid and effective expansion of the program and to explore new and effective ways of increasing milk consumption.

In my home State of Wisconsin, we cooperated in the study of price reduction. The Wisconsin experiment proved conclusively that: First, reduced prices resulted in increased numbers of children drinking milk at school; second, the greater the price reduction, the greater was the increase in consumption; and third, the increased milk consumption at school was new consumption, not a replacement of home consumption.

Mr. Speaker, another study conducted in St. Louis, Mo., during the 1955–56 school year shows beyond a shadow of a doubt that children from low-income families would be hardest hit by an increase in the amount of money they have to pay for milk at school. When the Federal reimbursement to the schools participating in the children's milk program was applied toward the reduction of the price of milk to the children, the pupils in the low-income districts increased milk consumption by 171 percent. Milk consumption by children in the middle-income districts went up 157 percent, but the increase by pupils in the high-income areas was only 44 percent.

We are lucky to live in a land which is blessed with an abundance of food. But this blessing of abundance carries with it a large responsibility. There is little excuse for malnutrition in this country, and even less excuse when it comes to our children. I would not have it on my conscience that I deprived any school kids of needed milk through short-sighted economy. I am sure my colleagues share my feelings and will support my bill to increase the funds for the children's milk program so it can continue the job it has been doing so well.

Problems Facing the Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. LEONARD G. WOLF

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 7, 1960

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, much has been printed in newspapers and periodicals since the first of the year heralding a booming, exciting, and progressive 10-year period in our future. We hope that all the good predictions will come true. But, I submit, Mr. Speaker, that before we can go forward with a new blueprint for the sixties, we must finish some of those tasks left undone in the last decade. In this session of Congress we must not let ourselves be sidetracked by false issues.

Some of the issues with which we must deal effectively are social security, agriculture and food for peace, interest rates and fiscal policy, education and school construction grants, and reevaluation of our defense programs. My views on these problems are outlined below:

1. SOCIAL SECURITY

In my travels through the district, I was struck with the fact that far too many of our older people—those who have made this society great—are not enjoying the wealth and prosperity of our society. We must drastically revise our present social security laws to enable our older citizens who desire to work to be given the chance to work without being penalized. It is becoming increasingly obvious that some form of national health insurance scheme must be worked out which will help all of our older citizens. For example, there are some 4 or 5 million people over age 65 and women over age 62 who are not eligible for social security benefits, although they have contributed to the system for many years, and although they are incapacitated for life. I believe that the present requirement that one must have worked under social security for at least 5 years out of the 10 years before becoming disabled should be revised.

2. INTEREST RATES AND FISCAL POLICY

The Federal Reserve banks and the Treasury Department are following independent and often mutually contradictory policies. Our Federal credit policies must be integrated lest we stifle economic growth while continuing the aimless road to inflation. We must create a national monetary and credit council which would include the Chairman of the Federal Reserve System, Secretary of the Treasury, Chairman of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, and heads of the other lending agencies.

The policy of high interest rates as set out by the administration are not stopping inflationary tendencies, but they are stifling competition and economic growth. From the little businessman in northeast Iowa to the high-powered economics professor, to the corporation executive who makes $100,000 a year, there is an awareness of the fact that only the giant corporations have easy access to money at all times regardless of interest rates. However, high interest rates destroy the chance for small businesses to borrow, compete, and grow since these groups depend on readily available money at reasonable interest rates in order to be able to borrow for expansion purposes.

The surest way to destroy small business and continue the road to monopoly and the surest way to destroy the small farmer is by encouraging and keeping a tight money program.

3. EDUCATION AND SCHOOL CONSTRUCTION

Congress should authorize and appropriate more money for more classrooms and higher teacher pay scales. Nationally we are short some 140,000 classrooms and our teachers are woefully underpaid. If this Congress does not pass the kind of legislation in education which will give this Nation more scientists and engineers, philosophers and social scientists, we will cease to be a first-rate power. This Congress must make the school bells ring loud and clear for better schools and teachers, rather than have those same bells toll for a nation that prefers to spend more on cigarettes and cosmetics than on education.

4. DEFENSE

This year Congress must take a long, hard look at its defense budget. Sixty-seven percent of the taxpayer's dollar is spent on defense and defense-related expenditures. It is clear that we are overspending in some areas and not spending enough in other areas. There are over $34 billion in military goods which have, in the last few years, been taken out of use and circulation by the Armed Forces.

Every dollar that is wasted in our national defense program and every dollar that is unnecessary takes away money which could be better spent in making our society richer and freer than any that has ever been known.

5. AGRICULTURE AND FOOD FOR PEACE

An international food for peace program through the United Nations that will get the food out of the storage bins and into the stomachs of the hungry of the world must be initiated. There is nothing more disgraceful to the United States than the fact that we have $10 billion worth of food and fiber resources rotting in our storage bins while a billion people are on the edge of starvation.

A thorough investigation is called for in the price structures of food resources. This Congress must explode the myth that the farmer is living off the fat of the land. We must study how it is that with a $10 billion food surplus on hand, paid for by the American taxpayer, the farmer's income has been lower than it has been in 18 years and, furthermore, why the consumer is paying more for food than he has ever paid before.

Mr. Speaker, when we have finished these tasks, then we will be ready for the adventure of the sixties.

Membership Rally of World War I Vets at Peabody, Mass.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 7, 1960

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, the John J. Splaine, Jr., Barracks No. 12, of Salem, Mass., is one of the most energetic units of the Veterans of World War I, of the U.S.A., Inc.

When the national organization announced the beginning of a drive to enroll 1 million members, Barracks No. 12 promptly swung into action. A call was sent out to members of the World War I Veterans of the U.S.A., Inc., in the eight cities and towns near Salem, to join Barracks No. 12 in a membership drive.

On Sunday afternoon, December 6, 1959, a very successful rally was held at the VFW Hall in Peabody, Mass., under the leadership of the John L. Splaine, Jr., Barracks of Salem.

The senior and junior department vice commanders of Massachusetts were present. George Leary, national junior vice commander, brought the greetings of the national organization; discussed the various pension bills; and gave helpful advice on ways methods to increase the membership.

It was my privilege to give the following address:

Greetings: All of us hoped, and I supposed most of us believed that World War I would be the last major war in history.

That was responsible for our attitude as veterans.

Many of our comrades didn't join any veterans' organization.

They went their separate ways, failing to understand that they would need the group as much as the group would need them to protect the legitimate interests of all veterans.

In December 1941 we suddenly sensed that a new and much larger group of veterans would come out of World War II. Twenty-three years had gone by, and so many things we should have accomplished had been postponed until another year.

When the very generous GI bill of rights was passed by the Congress in 1944 to help the veterans of World War II it made us look old-fashioned and negligent in promoting the unity and protecting the rights of World War I veterans.

Furthermore, we were no longer the last and strongest group of veterans.

And as we looked around at the changing situation it dawned upon us that we had no organization to represent exclusively the men and women who served from 1917 to 1918, and to speak for their special problems.

It was this lack that led to the establishment of the World War I Veterans of the U.S.A., Inc.

Its rapid growth within a few years shows that it is filling a long-felt need. At last we had a group to join that would be entirely our own and where we could share the same memories and the same interests.

Our first objective is to secure a pension for all of our comrades when they reach the age of eligibility.

Our second objective is to bring together all who served in World War I in a fraternity that will promote friendship and sociability.

It takes organizing skill and effort to do this.

We have not reached the thousands who would like to join but who need the helping hand of present members who will welcome them to our ranks and make them feel at home.

We have the incentives and the high morale.

I do not exaggerate when I claim that our group has more get-up-and-go than those groups of younger veterans who are indifferent, as we were at their age.

What we need is a plan of action, and enough volunteers to make it work; checking the records and drawing up lists of potential candidates for membership in our respective communities.

Do you ever stop to think of those classmates who graduated from school with you, who live in the same city or town as you do but whose paths have not crossed yours in years?

The situation is identical with respect to the aging veterans of the First World War.

Our job is to look them up, find them, and invite them to attend a barracks meeting so that they can enjoy a reunion with the buddies of long ago and actually see the programs we are arranging to revive that comradeship and pride of service.

Even a man's family life, with all its fulfillments, does not provide an outlet for this remembered experience which every veteran cherishes in his heart.

Only in the company of other veterans can this fellowship live again.

This rally is the opening of a membership drive by John J. Splaine, Jr., Barracks No. 12 for the benefit of World War I veterans who reside in the nine cities and towns in the vicinity of Salem.

Let us not forget the indispensable role of the ladies in this drive.

Auxiliaries are providing fine cooperation in many other communities throughout the country. When you enlist the idealism, the enthusiasm, and the hard-working support of the women your success will be certain.

We have a goal and we are not going to be detoured from it.

Ever since the Revolutionary War, the Congress has provided pensions for the aging veterans of all wars, and with no income restrictions. These non-service-connected pensions were not based on need, and were not considered as a retirement plan. They expressed in tangible form the Nation's gratitude to those who had risked their lives in its defense.

In the last session of Congress, when Fred Hollenbeck testified before the Committee on Veterans' Affairs he said, and I quote: "The files in our national headquarters are filled with appeals from men who have served in World War I pleading with us to do everything we can to secure for them a pension of $100 per month. These letters indicate that the writers do not have social security or other outside income and that they are in dire circumstances but do not want to go on the public dole to eke out an existence. They are bitter in what they feel is the lack of gratitude on the part of this Nation in not long ago having granted them the same consideration as has been granted to the veterans of all other wars prior to World War I." End of quote.

In that same session, a bill was passed that generally increased non-service-connected pensions for the veterans, widows, and dependents of all wars.

While this was praiseworthy at first glance, it was not altogether pure and beneficent in motive.

For its hidden purpose was to head off and place a barrier in the way of pensions for all World War I veterans upon reaching the qualifying age.

The architects of this bill really fooled themselves. While sidetracking the drive for a World War I pension bill, they forced through a measure that, by taking in the veterans of all wars, will cost more than twice as much as the bill to provide a pension of $100 a month to all eligible World War I veterans.

There are approximately 2,700,000 living World War I veterans.

About one-half are receiving service-connected disability compensation, or non-service-connected pensions.

In both cases, the amount received by the individual veteran is considerably less than $100 per month.

But the other half of this veteran population receive no compensation or pension from the Veterans' Administration.

The total cost of our bill covering the next 40 years will be less than $10 billion, or an average of $250 million a year. But the non-service-connected pension bill for all veterans, providing smaller monthly benefits, and squeezed by income limitations will cost more than twice the total of our bill.

The tactics employed against us have backfired.

Under the guise of economy, they have committed themselves to expenditures far greater than they anticipated in their preoccupation with stopping our pension drive.

Their argument that a pension for World War I vets would cost too much has been contradicted by their own actions.

We intend to go forward with our own bill.

We are determined that the discrimination which has operated against us shall be removed, and that the "forgotten veterans" of 1917–18 shall become the "recognized" veterans of the 1960's and beyond.

Through organizational meetings such as this, we shall increase the strength of our membership and its voice as we make steady progress toward the inevitable goal of a minimum pension of $100 per month for all veterans of the First World War.

Wheat Farmers Are Trying

OF
HON. WALT HORAN
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 7, 1960

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Speaker, last November, I had the pleasure of participating in the fifth annual convention of the Washington State Wheat Association held in Spokane, Wash. Delegates to the convention consisted of wheatgrowers, for the most part, and people in related industries. During this convention they were primarily interested in formulating a program that would not only benefit them as wheat producers but also the Nation in general. They were aware that one cannot analyze the farm problem without giving reference to the economics involved.

I am confident that my colleagues will benefit from reading a few of the more important resolutions, agreed to by the convention delegates, which are designed to help solve the farm problem, particularly that of the ever increasing wheat surplus. One resolution was endorsed by a 2-to-1 vote supporting the domestic parity plan for wheat as embodied in the wheat stabilization plan.

I am proud that I was one of the original sponsors of this program in the House of Representatives, because I feel that it is one solution to the acreage restriction program. Also, I believe it is founded on constructive economic principles. Briefly, the wheat stabilization program is designed to accomplish the following:

1. Reduce Government annual expense by approximately $545 million.
2. Reduce surplus wheat stocks by 75 million bushels annually.
3. Maintain the farmer's present net income.
4. Provide 100 percent of parity for the farmer on domestic wheat.
5. Give farmers freedom of decisions for planting.
6. Provide loans at 65 percent of parity.
7. Build up the soil with 20 percent in the soil bank.

This program, Mr. Speaker, is based on a bushelage control instead of the present acreage control, which would definitely stop further buildup of the Commodity Credit Corporation's stocks, as well as reduce their present holdings. Washington's wheatgrowers hope this stabilization program will be given a chance because they feel that it would be the answer to the hopes of the farmer and the answer to the complaints of the critics of farm programs.

In the field of marketing and market research, the delegates also recommended and endorsed programs of increased research in the areas of industrial utilization of farm products—agribusiness—alternate crops for diverted or alloted acreage, air classification, and expansion of research involving methods of producing higher quality grains. Legislatively, besides endorsing the wheat stabilization program, the delegates endorsed the action taken in the last session of Congress extending Public Law 480, the Agriculture Trade Development and Assistance Act. They also recommended that wheat foods be made available in greater variety under the food for peace plan initiated by the President in his agriculture message of last year. They particularly recommended a greater variety in the form of bulgour type wheat.

Mr. Speaker, let me say again that I am particularly pleased with the results of this convention for they prove that if anyone is sincerely interested in solving the farm problems, it is the farmers themselves. I believe that we should follow their example. It is necessary that we divest partisan politics from the farm problem and strive to enact a constructive farm program. Congress must not shirk its legislative responsibility in this instance, nor must the executive branch fail to carry out its administrative responsibility. Very few defend the farm legislation now on the books, but the fact remains that this legislation was put there by the Congress. And if it is to be changed, it must be changed by the Congress.

A Pioneer Among Pioneers in Aviation

OF
HON. FRANK J. BECKER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 7, 1960

Mr. BECKER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include an article from the Tri-Town Leader as well as copy of my letter to Dr. Walden on December 3, 1959, elaborating somewhat on his accomplishments. Dr. Henry W. Walden is a pioneer in the field of aviation and, last month, the New York Chapter of the Silver Wings Fraternity honored him on the occasion of the 50th anniversary of the first successful flight of the first American monoplane. It is fitting that we should pay tribute to this fine American.

The article follows:

[From the Tri-Town Leader, Dec. 17, 1959]

PIONEER AVIATOR IS HONORED ON ANNIVERSARY OF FLIGHT

The 50th anniversary of the first successful flight of the first American monoplane, which was made at Mineola, L.I., on December 9, 1909, was fittingly observed by the New York Chapter of Silver Wings Fraternity, at Mitchel Air Force Base. Maj. Louis W. Bieser, of Lynbrook, president of the New York chapter, was official host and toastmaster.

The guest of honor on this auspicious occasion was Dr. Henry W. Walden, famous aviation pioneer, who not only designed, built, and flew the first successful monoplanes in America, but who also designed and built the first radio-controlled, air-to-ground missile, in November 1915.

The original model of this missile, together with scale models of the Walden III and the Walden IX monoplanes are on permanent exhibition for historical record, at the National Air Museum of the Smithsonian Institution in Washington, D.C.

To bring the younger generation of airmen up to date on the country, Dr. Walden gave an illustrated talk on his dedicated work in aviation, beginning in 1908 and in continuing until 1942, in the Brick Theater at Mitchel Air Force Base. His talk was enthusiastically received by a large, attentive audience, who were continually amazed at the daring of the early pioneers of aviation.

Flying personnel of Mitchel Air Force Base; the Civil Air Patrol; Reserve air squadrons in the Long Island area, together with members of the Early Birds; Quiet Birdmen; Long Island Early Fliers and the 0X05 Club joined with the New York Chapter of Silver Wings Fraternity in honoring Dr. Walden on this happy, historical occasion.

Col. Andrew Slough, commanding the 2,500th Maintenance Squadron, extended greeting on behalf of Col. John O. Hall, air base commander, who was unexpectedly called away. Following the colonel's remarks, the following resolution was unanimously passed and sent to the Honorable James H. Douglas, Secretary of the Air Force:

"Resolved, That the members of the New York Chapter of Silver Wings Fraternity; the Early Birds; Quiet Birdmen; Long Island Early Fliers; CX–5 Club; the Civil Air Patrol, and Reserve air squadrons based in the Long Island area, here assembled, go on record as unanimously favoring the retention of Mitchel Field as a U.S. Air Force base."

At the conclusion of Dr. Walden's talk, Elmo N. Pickerill, of Mineola, vice president of the Early Birds, presented him with a handsome bronze plaque, commemorating the 50th anniversary of his signal achievement. This was followed by a presentation of a framed engrossed scroll by the Air Force Association.

DEAR DR. WALDEN: I am sorry that I cannot be present today to honor you personally on this important occasion. However, let me take this opportunity to join with the New York Chapter of the Silver Wings Fraternity in congratulating you on your contributions to the development of aviation.

On this day, 50 years after your flight at Mineola, we have gained the perspective to appreciate more fully the significance of that pioneering event. The frontiers of aviation which you explore have now been crossed by a great proportion of the American people, and one of our most important industries has been established there. The early monoplanes you designed and built have since been succeeded by a whole series of monoplanes, including the DC–2, the DC–3, the Atlantic Clipper, the Flying Fortress, the P–51 Mustang, and more recently the Boeing 707 and the DC–8. America has become a nation which flies and which depends on flight for its defense. How much it owes to you, the designer and pilot of the first successful American powered monoplane.

And now in this decade when the air age is being transformed into the space age and our thoughts are suddenly turned to a new world of missiles and satellites, we again discover that you have preceded us. For in November 1915 you achieved another first: the design and construction of the first radio-guided, air-to-land missile.

These first are but two of your accomplishments during a distinguished career in aviation. Therefore, it is altogether fitting that today we should commemorate your Mineola flight and pay tribute to your dedicated and innovating spirt. I send you my warmest congratulations.

Equalized Pay for Retired Members of the Uniformed Services

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN F. BALDWIN, JR.
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 7, 1960

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. Speaker, on the opening day of the 1st session of the 86th Congress, I introduced H.R. 703, designed to equalize the pay of retired members of the uniformed services. Similar bills have been introduced in the House of Representatives by 45 other Members.

President Eisenhower has now taken a stand in favor of this legislation. The Secretary of Defense, Mr. Thomas S. Gates, on December 11, 1959, also filed the following report addressed to the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, House of Representatives, endorsing the bill, with the suggestion that a substitute draft bill be adopted to eliminate certain technical deficiencies in the bill without making any substantive changes:

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, December 11, 1959.

Honorable CARL VINSON,
Chairman, Committee on Armed Services, House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Reference is made to your request for the views of the Department of Defense with respect to H.R. 703, H.R. 2912, H.R. 2973, and H.R. 5113.

The apparent purpose of the bills is to authorize those members and former members of the uniformed services who became entitled to the receipt of retired or retainer pay prior to June 1, 1958, and whose retired or retainer pay was based on rates of pay contained in section 201(a) of the Career Compensation Act of 1949, as amended, to recompute their entitlement to such pay on the basis of the new and higher rates of pay provided by the act of May 20, 1958, (Public Law 85–422). Although the language of the bills is somewhat ambiguous, it appears that the resultant increase in retired or retainer pay entitlement would accrue from the first day of the month following the date of enactment.

An examination of the bills reveals certain technical deficiencies which would prevent them from completely achieving their apparent purpose. Therefore, there is attached for consideration a substitute draft bill which will eliminate these deficiencies without making any substitute changes.

Public Law 85–422 specifically excluded personnel retired prior to June 1, 1958, from the benefits of the new pay rates and in lieu thereof authorized such personnel, except those with less than 2 years' service, a 6-percent increase in their retired or retainer pay. This treatment of retired personnel was a departure from the traditional concept of relating retired pay increases to active duty compensation and operated to nullify certain provisions of title 10, United States Code, which provide in essence that whenever the rates of pay for personnel on the active list are changed, the retired pay to which personnel are entitled shall be recomputed on the basis of the new rates. Also the inevitable result of a cutoff date, such as the effective date of Public Law 85–422, is to produce some disparities in rates of retired pay among personnel of the same grade and length of service, depending on date of retirement.

It should be noted that the proposed pay bill submitted to the Congress last year by the Department of Defense had as its objective a fundamental, sweeping change in the active duty military pay system rather than a pay raise as such. Under that bill some 38 percent of the personnel on active duty would have received no increase in basic pay except for a temporary 6-percent cost-of-living adjustment. Subsequently the House of Representatives passed a new bill which was prepared by the House Committee on Armed Services, concurred in by the Senate with minor amendments and enacted with the support of the Department of Defense to become Public Law 85–422. This law, as enacted, provided in effect a general pay increase of at least 6 percent for all active duty personnel with more than 2 years' service, and, as already noted, extended this 6 percent increase to all but the one category of personnel retired prior to June 1, 1958. Public Law 85–855, August 28, 1958, amended the Military Pay Act of June 1, 1958, and extended the 6-percent increase to those retired with less than 2 years' service.

The Department of Defense has restudied its earlier position on the recomputation of retired pay and after further consideration now believes it only equitable and fair to reestablish the traditional relationship between active duty pay and retired pay. The Department of Defense, therefore, recommends enactment of legislation to achieve these objectives as expressed in the attached substitute draft bill and believes the net result would be of significant value by increasing the morale, efficiency, and effectiveness of our active duty career personnel as well as avoiding discrimination against retired personnel who served their country faithfully and well.

If this legislation were enacted in time to become effective February 1, 1960, the increased cost for the last 5 months of fiscal year 1960 is estimated at $10,500,000. Funds to cover this increased cost were not included in the budget for fiscal year 1960 but it is believed that such cost could be absorbed within funds heretofore made available by the Congress.

Estimated increased costs for succeeding years are: fiscal year 1961, $24,470,000; fiscal year 1962, $23,980,000; fiscal year 1963, $23,500,000.

The Bureau of the Budget has advised that there is no objction to the submission of this report to the Congress and further that enactment of legislation along the lines of the proposed substitute draft bill is in accord with the President's program.

Sincerely yours,

THOMAS S. GATES.

Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of Defense, I yesterday introduced the substitute bill proposed by the Defense Department. This bill is H.R. 9304. Since this bill has the approval of both President Eisenhower and the Defense Department, I very much hope that the Armed Services Committee will schedule early hearings upon this and other similar bills so that this legislation can be brought before the House of Representatives as soon as possible. This bill will restore the almost undeviating principle in the military pay and retirement system that the pay of a retired member of the uniformed services should be directly geared to active duty pay of a member of the same rank and length of service. The purpose of this legislation is to reestablish this traditional principle which has come to be considered almost inviolate.

Address of Senator Talmadge

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. L. MENDEL RIVERS
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 7, 1960

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include herewith copy of Senator TALMADGE's speech. On Friday, November 20, 1959, in Columbia, S.C., the distinguished Senator from Georgia, the Honorable HERMAN TALMADGE, delivered the principal address at the South Carolina Democratic Party dinner and rally. The occasion was a fund-raising affair for the Democratic Party of South Carolina.

In his magnificent address, Senator TALMADGE, among other things, called attention to the fact that there are groups in this Nation today determined to divide and plunder the greatest political name a democracy has ever seen. In his address, he has offered to make every effort to work in unity with Democrats from every section of America. He has advised all Democrats that their party cannot win in 1960 by being a house divided against itself. He has called to the attention of so-called Democratic leaders that abuse of the South cannot continue if our party is to prevail as a major segment in our American political life. He has warned all Americans that the South will not continue to tolerate the baseless and irresponsible charges directed against our people by others of lesser stature in this Nation.

Mr. Speaker, Senator TALMADGE's address is a dignified message to Democrats all over America that the South is willing to march with them in unity but unwilling to march as an unequal or second-class member of a party which must campaign in unity if we are to win the congressional or presidential elections in November 1960.

Mr. Speaker, Democrats should heed the words of the great Senator from the great State of Georgia:

ADDRESS OF SENATOR TALMADGE AT SOUTH CAROLINA DEMOCRATIC PARTY DINNER AND RALLY

Governor Hollings, Senators Johnston and Thurmond, members of the South Carolina congressional delegation, Chairman Pope, distinguished officials, honored guests, and my fellow Democrats, thank you for according me the privilege and pleasure of sharing this great occasion with you.

In these days when one needs a program to tell the difference between a "Paul Butler Democrat" and a "modern Republican," it is refreshing indeed to meet with men and women like you who are proud to be plain, old-fashioned Democrats.

I salute you for your faithful adherence to the ideals and heritage of the party of Jefferson and Jackson and I am pleased to tell you that your Georgia brethren stand with you shoulder-to-shoulder in mutual determination to implement those ideals and to perpetuate that heritage.

We in Georgia feel a close kinship with the people of South Carolina. In many cases—as in my own family—there is a common bond of blood and family ties.

Our States have developed economically and politically along parallel lines.

Our States have shared many common causes.

Our States have stood together in victory and defeat.

And it is my earnest hope that, regardless of what the future may bring, events always will find the people of our States united as one in all matters involving their lives, fortunes, and sacred honor.

South Carolina is blessed with capable, courageous, and stalwart leaders.

Your brilliant young Governor has established himself in the eyes of the South and the Nation as a man of ability, dedication, and integrity from whom much will be heard in the future.

No State has Senators and Congressmen who are more highly respected or who are more consistently effective in serving the interests of their constituents, State, and Nation than South Carolina.

It is an honor to serve in the U.S. Senate with patriots of the stature of OLIN JOHNSTON and STROM THURMOND. Their constant and vigorous efforts in defense of constitutional government and individual liberty are unmatched examples of statesmanship of the highest order.

Both men have proved themselves worthy successors to the mantle of John C. Calhoun—your States illustrious and incomparable statesman of the 19th century who recently was selected as one of the five greatest Senators of all times.

If we had 50 more men of the caliber and conviction of OLIN JOHNSTON and STROM THURMOND in the Senate of the United States, this country would not be in the difficulties it is today.

Your presence here tonight bespeaks your abiding faith in the Democratic Party and your intense devotion to the principles upon which it was founded and grew great. It evidences your heartfelt hope that the party can be wrested from the hands of those who would destroy it for personal aggrandizement and restored as an instrument for effecting the will of the masses of the American people.

The Democratic Party was founded as the party of constitutional principle—a party dedicated to the protection and preservation of our great, unique, republican form of government under which government is the servant, not the master, of the people.

The Democratic Party grew strong in its espousal of the right of the individual to manage his own affairs and its insistence upon maintaining at all costs the guarantees of freedom and local self-determination contained in the Bill of Rights of our Constitution.

The Democratic Party has always held the confidence of "grassroots" Americana so long as it adhered to its founding principles. It has been repudiated only when it lost sight of its aims and allowed itself to become the tool of special interests and pressure groups.

It now stands on the threshold of the greatest opportunity ever afforded to any political party in the history of our Nation.

The results of last year's congressional election prove conclusively that the rank and file of Americans of all regions shares our faith in and hope for the Democratic Party.

If the Democratic Party will only capitalize upon that fact by presenting itself to the electorate next year with candidates and a platform which will command the unified support of Democrats in all States and regions, there is no reason why it should not realize in 1960 the greatest victory for the people since 1936.

The very strength of the Democratic Party lies in the fact that it attracts its supporters from all levels of society and segments of the economy—that within its ranks are represented industrialists and workers, farmers and businessmen, housewives and society matrons and persons of every race, color, and creed.

The Democratic Party represents a true cross section of the United States and that fact sets it apart from any other political party today. From that composition it derives a potentially universal strength which, if properly mobilized, can make it impregnable at the polls.

A proper mobilization of that strength demands nothing more than that Democrats of all shades of opinion recognize realities and meet one another halfway to put our best foot forward by emphasizing our many areas of agreement instead of our few areas of disagreement.

I see nothing impossible or even extremely difficult about that if all Democrats of good will who are earnestly interested in promoting Democratic unity and victory will work together to give the country a ticket and a program which all voters—southern as well as northern, eastern, and western—can support with enthusiasm and in good conscience.

I, for one, am ready to do my part to achieve that end.

I believe I am correct in stating that the vast majority of southern Democrats feels the same way.

However, we must recognize that there are those who presently occupy places of leadership in our party who are not interested in unity or, for that matter, in winning elections. They would rather feather their own political nests by appeasing pressure groups and catering to social and economic extremists than to serve present and future generations by putting a responsible Democratic administration in office in 1961.

Those individuals would like nothing better than to nominate candidates and write a platform so completely obnoxious as to drive southern Democrats from the Democratic Party next year.

Let me state for the benefit of those who may be considering such a course that they will have to drive us out because we Democrats of the South will never leave the party of our fathers voluntarily.

Let me further state for their benefit that, if they do drive us out of the party, they will do so at their own peril.

The Democratic Party cannot win in 1960 without the South.

The Democratic Party cannot win in 1960 without the South because it will have to have every electoral vote the South can give it to offset the electoral votes of the two most populous States from which the Republican Party likely will draw its candidates.

The Democratic Party cannot win in 1960 without the South because, if the Democratic convention drives the South from the party, there will not be just two, three, or four States which will leave—the entire South will go.

Therefore, to those who sit in seats of responsibility in Democratic National Headquarters in Washington, let me make these points clear beyond misunderstanding:

Southern Democrats will go to the Democratic convention to stay in the party.

Southern Democrats will meet their brethren from other regions halfway in any honest effort to resolve the areas of disagreement between us and to present a united front before the Nation.

Southern Democrats will give their support to any candidates nominated and to any platform approved which are not obnoxious or a calculated insult to our States and our people.

Whether southern Democrats stay in the party is up to the convention.

The convention can take one of two courses—it can keep the South in the party and win or it can drive the South from the party and assure another Republican victory.

Southern Democrats fervently hope for the former but they will not be unprepared for the latter.

The Democrats of the South are sick and tired of being rewarded for their consistent support of the party by being cast in the role of party whipping boy.

The Democrats of the South are fed up with being tied to the national stake every 4 years by fellow Democrats to be ridiculed, castigated and punished as the price for the support of those whose stock in trade is racial demagogy, agitation, and exploitation.

The Democrats of the South have learned the hard lesson of not allowing themselves to be taken for granted and are determined that in the future they shall be as vigorous and as vociferous in seeking their due recognition as are the NAACP, the ADA and the other organized pressure groups which are bent upon turning the Democratic Party into their own private shooting preserve.

If we southern Democrats have anything for which to blame ourselves, it is that we have for too long allowed extremists within and without the party to distort and discredit our motives and to misinterpret and malign our since efforts to solve our problems.

We have allowed ourselves to be libeled by the self-serving propaganda of radical political elements.

We have allowed our insistence upon adherence to the Democratic principle of local self-government to be characterized falsely as reaction and inhumanity.

In short, we have allowed ourselves to be placed on the defensive.

It is time that we put the shoe on the other foot.

We of the South do not have to yield to anyone in the sincerity and intensity of our dedication to the Democratic precepts of justice, decency and fair play for all.

We need make apologies to no one for what we profess or practice.

To be sure we have our problems and our shortcomings, but we are trying to do something about them.

We make no pretense at being perfect.

Neither do we presume to sit in judgment on the imperfections of others.

And we do not consider it unreasonable to expect that Democrats of other regions—whose imperfections are no less pronounced than ours—should accord us the same tolerance.

The greatest need of the Democratic Party is a recognition of the fundamental fact that in a nation as large and diverse as ours there can be no single or pat solution to problems involving human relations.

Such problems are so varied and complex that they can be satisfactorily and amicably resolved only by the individuals who are confronted with them.

It would be wonderful indeed if solutions could be realized by the passage of laws.

Were that the case there would be no human problem which could not be solved by the enactment of a new law.

Were that the case everyone could be made healthy, happy, wealthy, wise, and equal by statute.

Were that the case churches, armies, courts, schools, political parties, and all the other institutions and instruments of our imperfect society could be superseded by an omnipotent superlegislature dedicated to the achievement of absolute human perfection.

Unfortunately, complex social problems are not susceptible to so simple a solution.

To the contrary the sum total of the experience of mankind stands as irrefutable proof that human motives and attitudes are not readily amenable to the legislative process.

It is true that change can be accomplished by force so long as that force is applied continuously.

But it is equally true that lasting change for the better comes from the inside of man out—not from the outside in.

True progress in the area of human relations can be achieved only to the degree that the inherent individuality of human personality is voluntarily sublimated to the common good.

To ignore that factor as some leaders of the Democratic Party would have us do is to invite chaos.

Thomas Jefferson recognized that fact when he wrote in the Declaration of Independence that government should derive its just powers from the consent of the governed.

George Mason recognized that fact by providing in the 9th and 10th amendments that all powers not specifically delegated to the National Government would be reserved to the States and the people.

Andrew Jackson recognized that fact in declaring in his farewell address that "the Constitution cannot be maintained, nor the Union preserved, in opposition to public feeling, by the mere extension of the coercive powers confided to the Federal Government."

That rugged warrior and dedicated man of the people who brought to the Democratic Party a fuller realization of Jeffersonian principles so eloquently and forcefully stated the point I would make that I would like to borrow from his words to do so.

Declared he:

"In a country so extensive as the United States, and with pursuits so varied, the internal regulations of the several States must frequently differ from one another in important particulars; and this difference is unavoidably increased by the varying principles upon which the American Colonies were originally planted; principles which had taken deep root in their social relations before the Revolution, and, therefore, of necessity, influencing their policy since they became free and independent States. But each State has the unquestionable right to regulate its own internal concerns according to its own pleasure; and while it does not interfere with the rights of the people of other States, or the rights of the Union, every State must be the sole judge of the measures proper to secure the safety of its citizens and promote their happiness and all efforts on the part of the people of other States to cast odium upon their institutions, and all measures calculated to disturb their rights of property, or put in jeopardy their peace and internal tranquillity, are in direct opposition to the spirit in which the Union was formed and may endanger its safety.

"Motives of philanthropy may be assigned for this unwarrantable interference; and weak men may persuade themselves for a moment that they are laboring in the cause of humanity, and asserting the rights of the human race; but everyone, upon sober reflection, will see that nothing but mischief can come from these improper assaults upon the feelings and rights of others. Rest assured that the men found busy in this work of discord are not worthy of your confidence and deserve your strongest reprobation."

Andrew Jackson's Farewell Address constitutes perhaps the most masterful statement of Democratic philosophy ever written and the Democratic Party in preparing to meet the electorate next year would do well to heed its admonitions.

If I were delivering the keynote address at the Democratic National Convention next July, I would be sorely tempted to read it to the delegates in full.

I can think of no more effective way to emphasize the inconsistency of those who would claim the name of the party of Jackson on the one hand while on the other hand espousing programs and policies which profane everything for which that great and noble Democrat stood.

The American people are looking hopefully and prayerfully to the Democratic Party to offer them a way out of the disaster of the present Republican administration.

They demonstrated at the polls last year that they are ready to give their ballots to the Democratic Party if it will but offer them something better and respond realistically and vigorously to the challenge to lead the country to restored opportunity and freedom for the individual.

The present administration has failed the American people on every front.

It has failed to maintain our national defense posture and has left us unprepared to meet either the threat of war or the challenge of peace.

It has failed to stabilize the Nation's economy and to restore reason to Federal spending and taxing policies.

It not only has failed the farmers of the Nation but also has been callously indifferent to their worsening plight.

It has failed to uphold constitutional government and has instead embraced the philosophy of judicial and executive usurpation of the constitutional rights of the States and their citizens.

This administration has been one of waste, extravagance, special privilege, high interest rates, high taxes, runaway inflation, tight money and mounting debt.

What it has given the American people has been a far cry from the high-sounding promises which its candidates made to them during the so-called crusade of 1952.

The American people are no longer fooled by an administration and a party which come to them with the voice of Jacob and the hands of Esau.

Americans are weary of bearing the burdens of a national government which has ceased to be their servant.

Americans are weary of tolerating the regimentation of a sprawling bureaucracy which has ceased to be responsive to their will.

Americans are weary of countenancing the extravagances of global planners who have no concern for the welfare of the people here at home.

Americans are weary of listening to the empty promises of false prophets who cry peace when there is no peace and plenty when there is no plenty.

Americans are restive under the yoke of oppressive taxes and irresponsible Government spending which are destroying the economy of this country.

Americans are frustrated by judicial and executive dictation which is robbing them and their children of their heritage of freedom.

From the mail which I receive from all sections of the Nation I am convinced that the average citizen is gravely concerned about the present course being followed by our National Government and the consequences of following it to its ultimate conclusion.

I am convinced that the overwhelming majority of the American people wants to see the Federal budget balanced and the Nation's economy stabilized.

I am convinced that the overwhelming majority of the American people wants the United States to cease doing for people in other countries what it either is unable or unwilling to do for our own citizens here at home.

I am convinced that the overwhelming majority of the American people wants the Federal Government to confine its activities to those areas reserved to it by the Constitution and leave the management of all other matters to local people on the local level.

I am convinced that the overwhelming majority of the American people wants above all else for the United States to be made militarily and economically secure and for themselves to be left alone to run their own affairs and enjoy the fruits of their own labor.

The future of the Democratic Party will depend directly upon its ability to translate those desires into positive action and that action in turn into concrete deeds.

The future of the United States may well depend upon how the Democratic Party responds to that challenge.

The kind of program which the American people want and expect of the Democratic Party was outlined by the father of the party, the revered Thomas Jefferson, in his first inaugural address.

He called for:

"Equal and exact justice to all men, of whatever state or persuasion, religious or political; peace, commerce and honest friendship with all nations—entangling alliances with none; the support of the State governments in all their rights, as the most competent administrations for our domestic concerns, and the surest bulwarks against antirepublican tendencies; and the preservation of the General Government in its whole constitutional vigour, as the sheet anchor of our peace at home and safety abroad."

Such a program is one on which all Americans of all States and regions could agree and which all Americans regardless of their place of residence could wholeheartedly support.

Such a program is one which could unify the Democratic Party and make it an invincible instrument of the people's will unparalleled in our history.

Such a program is one which would guarantee a Democratic administration in the White House not only in 1961 but also for as long as the party adhered to it.

I would like to hope, my fellow Democrats, that the party of Jefferson will adopt the program of Jefferson as its 1960 platform.

I am sure I speak your sentiments when I say that we Democrats of the South shall spare no effort in seeking that end.

Senator Lyndon Johnson Shows the Way to Responsible Leadership

OF
HON. VICTOR L. ANFUSO
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 7, 1960

Mr. ANFUSO. Mr. Speaker, as we stand on the threshold of a new session, a new year and an uncertain new decade, we search the political horizon for a strong ship of state to guide us through this decisive period.

It is, therefore, a very happy privilege for me to be able to introduce for the permanent record of the Congress, a historymaking speech by Senate majority leader, LYNDON B. JOHNSON, made at the annual citizens awards dinner of the nationalities division of the Democratic National Committee in Philadelphia on November 29, 1959.

Every American should read this speech because it charts the course which this country must follow if it is to retain the leadership of the world.

The ovation which followed Senator JOHNSON'S address, made to representatives of every minority group in the land, was thunderous and the words he uttered will never be forgotten by those who were privileged to hear him.

Senator JOHNSON should not be stigmatized as carrying the banner of any particular State or territory. When he speaks, he speaks for and on behalf of our great Nation and for that reason he enjoys, as majority leader of the highest legislative body in the entire world, the confidence of Senators who represent every segment of our population. Both Democrats and Republicans recognize his leadership ability, respect his judgment and admire his courage. All the people have benefited from his warm and generous heart.

I recall one vivid example of his humanity for all men. In a segregated hotel in Houston, Tex., Senator JOHNSON threatened to stay away from a dinner in his own honor if Negro ticketholders were refused admission. His firm insistence was responsible for the breaking of precedent in that city. This and many other incidents have caused him to be labeled in the South as a Roosevelt liberal. I know Senator JOHNSON is proud of that label because he was instrumental in placing on the statute books most of the great liberal legislation sponsored by the Roosevelt administration.

In fact, the record will show that without his drive, without his leadership, none of the legislation so vigorously supported by northern Congressmen could ever have become law.

Senator JOHNSON is a genuine and not a fair-weather friend of labor, with a real sense of the national interest. It was he who masterminded the original Kennedy-Ervin labor bill through the Senate by a vote of 89 to 1. Had that bill been accepted by the House, it is now conceded by all labor leaders, it would have been much more beneficial to labor.

Senator JOHNSON has also assured me that he will lead in the passage of improved minimum wage and civil-rights legislation during this session of Congress.

The question has often been asked, "Why doesn't Senator JOHNSON travel around the country, or the world for that matter, as other Senators do?" The answer is simple—as majority leader he has to be in Washington to guide legislation. This is his job and the reason he was elected majority leader.

Mr. Speaker, it would indeed be unfortunate for the American people if the full dynamic ability of this great statesman should be restrained merely because of his place of birth. It is my hope that during the volatile sixties before us, the unchallenged leader of the Congress of the United States will be drafted to greater service on behalf of our Nation.

The text of Senator JOHNSON's address is as follows:

ADDRESS BY SENATE MAJORITY LEADER LYNDON B. JOHNSON, CITIZENS AWARDS DINNER, NATIONALITIES DIVISION, DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL COMMITTEE, PHILADELPHIA, PA., NOVEMBER 29, 1959

THE ISSUE IS RESPONSIBILITY

I am proud—as I know you are—that we live in a land where we can hold to our own origins without our origins being held against us. I am proud to be a member of a party that opens its doors to all men—and closes its heart to none.

Tonight we meet in the name of that party.

We are drawn together—not by special interests in where we came from but by overriding interests in where we are going—as free men, as Americans, and as Democrats.

THE MOST DECISIVE DECADE

Tonight we are 32 days away from the 1960's.

In history's most decisive century, the 1960's will be the most decisive decade. The world will make its choice. Either we shall—together—turn up the road toward universal freedom. Or we shall—together—turn down the road toward universal slavery.

In the 1950's the world has stood at a stalemate.

In the 1960's the world will stand no longer.

The world will choose.

The world will move.

Free men will be the movers—or they will be moved aside. That is the choice: clear, simple, final. The decision the world reaches in this next decade will decide the century. That decision must be won by free men.

THE LEADERSHIP WE OFFER

The decision will turn on one thing: leadership.

Either the world will choose the leadership we offer.

Or the world will choose the leadership communism provides.

In this next decade, our capacity for leadership will be as vital as our capacity for arms. The strategies of leadership will be more important than the strategies of the battlefield. This is precisely the area where we are challenged today—by Mr. Khrushchev personally and by all the energy of the Communist world.

OUR RESPONSE

What is to be our response?

How is America to lead as America must lead?

We cannot lead by waggling our finger under the nose of the world and arguing our cause with angry words. We cannot lead by wringing our hands and biting our nails and agonizing over the decline of America's character. We cannot lead by busying ourselves with divisions of race or religion or birth or occupation.

America has the strength to keep its composure.

America has the character to justify its confidence.

And America has the capacity and commonsense to perfect the unity of its people.

If America is to lead, America must speak from the bottom of its heart and not from the top of its head.

The language of world leadership is the language of the heart. This is what moves men. This is what leads.

THE ROAD TO AMERICA

Let us look back for a moment—back along the road that has brought us together in this assembly tonight. Up that road to America—over the past 140 years—have come 40 million men and women.

Forty million men and women have surrendered what the human spirit surrenders most reluctantly to come here. Forty million gave up birthplace, homeland, family to cross the seas to America.

What moved these millions?

What led them to America?

They were moved by their dreams.

And they were led to America by faith that here those dreams had promise of fulfillment.

Those two facts should be fixed in our minds and in our policies.

THE DREAMS OF THE WORLD

No force is as powerful in moving men as their dreams, their hopes, their yearnings. No appeal America offers has ever been so strong in leading other men as the promise of fulfillment for those dreams and hopes and yearnings.

If America is to lead now, Americans must understand the dreams of the world—and America's policies and purposes must be understandable and understood by the peoples of the earth.

Those policies and purposes are not understandable now.

Here—in the Western Hemisphere—we have half the world's annual income. Here—in America—we have lived during the postwar years 4 times better than the Europeans, 5 times better than the Russians, 9 times better than the peoples of Latin America, 20 times better than the African, 30 times better than the Asian.

Half the workingmen of the world take home less in a year than our workers—in many instances—may take home in 2 weeks.

CAN WE AFFORD OUR DREAMS?

Yet with all this wealth—all this advantage—our national leadership today tells the world that Americans cannot afford their dreams.

That leadership pleads impoverishment amid plenty.

That leadership signals stop to America just as the world aspires to go.

That leadership argues that we cannot meet the needs of our people for houses, the needs of our young for education, the needs of our aged for dignity and decency.

America may be understood by the readers of the financial pages—but America is not understood by the world.

THE STATIC AMERICA?

The party which holds the Executive position has cut the people's dreams out of the budget of its concerns. On the edge of the century's most dynamic decade, they have embarked upon a course which can only lead to a static America—a static economy—a static Nation.

Some men say there is no issue.

I say there has never been a greater issue.

Freedom is a road to travel—not a parking lot. America must not stop just as the world is beginning to move. If America is to move the world, America itself must move. Or else America will be moved aside.

MOVING AMERICA FORWARD

Throughout the history of the national parties, the Democratic Party has been the party that has moved America forward. This is the role to which we shall continue to dedicate our efforts.

Twenty-five years ago the people of this Nation began the most dramatic movement forward that history has yet to see.

At the helm of the Nation stood a great American who had the heart to be responsive and the courage to be responsible—Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Fifteen years ago—at the end of a great war—that forward momentum of the American people was sustained and carried upward to new heights.

Once again, at the helm of the Nation, stood a great American who had the courage to be responsible—Harry S. Truman.

A BETTER DEAL

Today, once more, we stand at a moment when America can move forward to heights we have never attained before or sink back to depths we have never known.

The opportunity is ours.

The moment has come for the Democratic Party to offer the people of America and the people of the world a better deal.

The people of America and the world want peace. We shall work for the strength to secure that peace with honor and without fear.

The people of America live under a Constitution. We shall work without hesitation, without compromise to secure for every American his constitutional rights in full measure.

The people of America want homes for their families, food for their babies, employment for their abilities, health for their bodies, and education for their minds. We shall work to fashion a society and an economy and a Government from which these things will flow in more generous measure.

FREEDOM MUST HAVE A FLOOR

The peoples of the world yearn in their hearts as we have yearned. We shall heed those yearnings. We shall commit ourselves—in this decade of commitment—to the leadership of an effective world order in which there is a parity of dignity and opportunity for all men who would be free.

Freedom must have a floor on which free men can stand together as they reach for the heavens in this age of space.

We speak simply because this is the language the hearts of the world understand.

I want to read to you a report I have received from one of the most outstanding young Senators and outstanding young Americans I know—ED MUSKIE of Maine. Senator MUSKIE's father came to this country from Poland. This fall Senator MUSKIE went behind the Iron Curtain to seek out the village of his father's boyhood.

This is what he wrote of the people he found there in that land which has so long burned with flames of liberty:

"It is difficult to comprehend the economic circumstances of the people in that little village—the bareness of their lives. They have no meat; they stand in line for bread. Their diet appears to consist of potatoes and cabbages. The monthly wage is roughly equivalent to $10 to $20; their personal possessions almost unbelievably meager. This is indeed the saddest part of Poland. But for my father's dream of freedom and opportunity, this would be my life—the life of my children."

This is the world we live in.

This is the world we must lead toward freedom.

The issue for 1960—the issue for our times—is responsibility. The American people are responsible people. They know responsibility when they see it. They will choose responsibility when it is offered. That is what the Democratic Party has offered. That is what the Democratic Party must continue to offer.

Some say that responsibility will not win.

I say to you that in these times nothing but responsibility will win—for nothing less is worthy of us as free men, as Americans, and as Democrats.

Our Challenge for 1960

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROMAN C. PUCINSKI
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 7, 1960

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, following is the annual message which I delivered to my constituents, Sunday, January 3, over station WIND:

OUR CHALLENGE FOR 1960

Thank you—next Wednesday, the 2d session of the 86th Congress will reconvene in Washington and for the next 6 months efforts will be made to translate into law the soundings which most Members of Congress garnered from their constituents during the 14-week recess. In a sense, this will be a rather historic session if for no other reason than that it will be the first time Congress will assemble in the new decade of the 1960's. But there are other reasons why this session could become historic. We as a free people in the United States—through our Representatives in Congress—must attempt to strengthen our traditional formula of freedom and well-being at a time when the surface of the world is stirring; when entire continents are surging; when time itself is being telescoped. Everywhere throughout the world there is movement; awakened hopes—new horizons. And all of this springs from the knowledge, no longer subject to suppression, that human life should mean more than a deadening subsistence. The time bomb of human expectancy is loudly ticking. Those who close their ears to it shall have them rudely opened by its explosion.

It is neither my purpose this evening to be an alarmist on the one hand nor an ignoble quiescent on the other. Rather, I should like to discuss with you briefly this evening on "Congressional Report," the problems which confront our Nation and the world as we begin this new decade of the 1960's. I am certain that many of you may have mentioned some of these problems as you toasted in the new year yesterday. But I am equally certain that many of you, more comfortable than ever in your day-to-day existence, have not given them even a fleeting thought. In my brief career as a Representative in Congress, I have found that many people are anxious to discuss the great challenge which lies ahead, if America is to survive as a republic—governed by free people. But I have also found that many of our citizens do not want to face up to reality—do not want to hear anything which may in the slightest disturb the placid calm of their very comfortable existence. Paradoxically, after spending the last 3 months talking to thousands of people, I have a feeling that the ranks of this second group are increasing at an alarming rate. I've found that many of our citizens want to do nothing which might disturb the status quo. This indeed is tragic. For it is my firm conviction that the dynamics of a democracy such as we have, and which has made our Nation the most prosperous in the world, cannot afford the luxury of relaxing when the entire world is on the move. I am deeply concerned about the widespread apathy—the total conformity—which dictates the spirit of so many of our people here in America at a time when leaders throughout the world are inspiring their people into various ventures—some designed for good and, unfortunately, some designed for evil.

Frequently, however, it is difficult to be frank in this type of atmosphere. I should like to recall for you an ancient legend about the Locrians in Greece who reportedly gave the first expression to free speech, but at a price that many considered too costly. The Locrians would permit any person to address an assembly on any subject he or she wished but under one condition. A rope was placed around the speaker's neck and if the audience did not agree with what he said, he was promptly hanged. I have recited this story because I hasten to assure you, that as a Member of Congress who must take a position on controversial issues, I frequently understand and appreciate how some of these Locrian speakers must have felt as they faced their audience. While millions of Americans can very easily avoid the fate of the Locrians simply by not engaging in the debate of issues confronting our Nation, a Member of Congress cannot shirk this responsibility. I should like to assure you there is no more lonely place in the world than in the well of the House of Representatives or the Senate when a Member of Congress must stand up and be counted by casting either a "yea" or "nay" vote on a controversial issue. For you see, even after a Congressman has listened to all of the arguments pro and con on an explosive issue; even after he has read all of the editorial comments; studied the mail from his constituents; heard out the lobbyists—he, and he alone, must make the final decision on his vote. Because the world, and our own Government in it, have become so fantastically complicated, I can assure you that a Congressman's final decision frequently is a most difficult one to make.

I shall not go into detailed analysis of the fifties which we laid to rest only yesterday and which in my own humble opinion were to a great extent unproductive. I would rather address the limited time I have this evening to the problem which we as Americans must resolve as quickly as possible during the 1960's if we are to survive as a nation. It is my very firm conviction that overshadowing all else is the great challenge that we as Americans must face in dealing with the growing menace of international communism. Bluntly stated, you and I—and millions of other Americans like us—must decide whether we shall have the courage to stand up against the spread of international communism or whether we shall idly sit back and wait—like the ancient Chinese who never did find a way to deal with the locust—until it devours us. As U.S. News & World Report pointed out in a leading article last week, at some time, not many years from now, the American people are likely to be offered this choice: surrender or fight a nuclear war. And, the article points out, the way things are going, the United States could lose that war. What is the basis for this pessimism at a time when optimism appears to be bursting out on all sides and world leaders are talking of peace and disarmament? Three reports prepared by Americans whose entire lives have been devoted to studying the powerful forces at work in the world—reports prepared for the Senate Foreign Relations Committee—may give us a partial answer. The first report was prepared by a research group at Johns Hopkins University; a second report was prepared by the Stanford Research Institute, and a third by experts operating under the Rockefeller Brothers Fund. Add to this the views of highly informed Government officials and these conclusions emerge:

(1) The United States is now open and vulnerable to a direct attack by nuclear missiles and this country's vulnerability is steadily increasing.

(2) There can be no guaranteed security in the world when rival systems of government exist, each possessing the means of mass nuclear destruction. As more nations develop their own nuclear devices, the horror of nuclear war may prove no deterrent if a showdown comes; just as possession of poison gas by both the Western Powers and Nazi Germany proved no deterrent to World War II.

(3) The indisputable trend in the world today is toward dominance in the world by a single power. Let there be no mistaking of Khrushchev's beguiling smile for a sincere desire to work out the problems of the world. For those who might be tempted toward those conclusions, let me remind them that international communism has made fantastic gains in 72 nations of the world in the last decade and that the Communist Party—even though operating from the sewers of the underground, is more powerful and effective in America today than at any time in the history of our Nation. My basis for this statement is a recent report issued by the head of our own Federal Bureau of Investigation, J. Edgar Hoover.

(4) As U.S. News & World Report points out, the United States, at the end of World War II, was in a position to assume world domination. That opportunity was rejected. The United States, ever since, has been retreating gradually from one position after another. Soviet Russia, on the other hand, is demonstrating a determination to rule the world. At the end of World War II, Russia was prostrate. Today, only 15 years later, she is able to challenge America. There is no precedent in world history of such a reversal of positions of nations in such a short time. This Russian success breeds Russian confidence and strengthens Russian determination to push ahead. There are those among us who still cling to the naive belief that an uprising in Russia may reverse this threat, but on the basis of best available information which I have received in Washington, such a move is highly doubtful. Forty years of Communist tyranny in the Soviet Union have destroyed any possibility of revolt among the Russian people and today they stand firmly behind their leadership. In tragic contrast, compare how badly divided is the free world on its own aims. The suggestion in Paris last week by the heads of state that a series of conferences be held with the Soviet rulers should make it clear to all of us that the leaders of the free world are unable to agree on their aims and, in effect, they will let Khrushchev suggest the final decision at the summit.

Finally, No. 5, Soviet Russia, because of her gains, while the United States and her allies draw back under a policy of peace at any price, is tilting the balance of power steadily in her own direction. When the tilt appears to Russia's rulers to be decisive, she then will be tempted to offer the United States the fateful choice—surrender or fight a nuclear war. There undoubtedly will be much testing of strength and alarms—such as the Berlin crisis—before the final showdown comes.

My most bitter indictment of the past decade is that the constant threat of nuclear destruction—used so effectively by the Communists and also, unwittingly, by many decent Americans—has become a form of nuclear blackmail. This 2d session of the 86th Congress will have to put our Nation's entire foreign policy under a scrutinizing spotlight and see whether we have the wisdom and courage to find an answer. I know this: the free world has always won when it had the courage to stand up for its traditional faith in the truth of human freedom and justice. It is my firm conviction that the unprecedented reception given President Eisenhower on his recent tour of 11 nations in Europe and the Middle East was a manifestation of how deeply the people of these nations rely on the United States to provide courageous leadership in the struggle with international communism. If we as Americans can only accept the doctrine that there is vastly more vigor in defending a right rather than fighting a wrong, we shall destroy Khrushchev's hopes for world domination. Lamentably, however, I fear that the formulators of our foreign policy have already written off the captive nations of Europe—Estonia, Lithuania, Latvia, Poland, Hungary, Bulgaria, Rumania, and East Germany—as belonging to the Soviet sphere of influence even though the announcement has not been made official. Khrushchev and his followers, I am certain, will retreat only when we make the liberation of these enslaved nations the cornerstone of our foreign policy.

There are many domestic issues which we Americans must face up to if we are to fulfill the real meaning of democracy. This session of Congress will have to deal with legislation which will give America the educational tools with which to wage intellectual war against the Soviet Union. I believe passage of the Federal aid to education bill is a must on our agenda when we reconvene. We will have to deal with nationwide strikes so that our economy can meet the growing challenge of foreign trade but here again we are faced with the great problem of trying to avoid nationwide work stoppages without destroying the collective bargaining rights of the American businessman or the American worker. In this next session we must attempt to rewrite our archaic tax structure so that there will be a more equitable distribution of fiscal responsibilities by eliminating many of the tax loopholes now in existence; we will have to meet the ever-increasing need of adequate medical and hospital care for our senior citizens; we will have to help our great cities—including Chicago—rebuild the core of their metropolis so that dead property now considered unproductive slums can be placed back on the tax rolls. In my own 11th Congressional District on Chicago's Northwest Side, thousands of homeowners are paying excessive real-estate taxes because the city now collects little if any tax yield from the slum areas of the city; we must in this session produce effective farm legislation which will end the national scandal under which we are spending $6 billion annually for farm support programs and finally we must produce a budget which will eliminate deficit spending. This is the great challenge for the 2d session of the 86th Congress.

In closing may I again thank station WIND for making this time available and to assure all of you that not only I but every Member of Congress shall direct his efforts in this next session toward meeting the great challenge facing America. I will be most grateful, however, if you will be good enough to send me your own views on the problems I have discussed addressing your letter to Congressman ROMAN C. PUCINSKI, 11th District of Illinois, Washington, D.C. May I take this opportunity to wish you all a very happy, healthy, and prosperous new year.

Parity in Politics

OF

HON. JOHN H. RAY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 7, 1960

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to present to the readers of the RECORD a thoughtful and constructive address delivered by the Honorable JOHN W. BYRNES, Republican of Wisconsin, before the American Farm Bureau Federation at its meeting in Chicago, Ill., on December 16, 1959:

PARITY IN POLITICS

(Address of Representative JOHN W. BYRNES, Republican of Wisconsin, before the American Farm Bureau Federation, Chicago, Ill., December 16, 1959)

I would like to point out this morning what I believe are some alarming developments in our national internal life and to suggest the role that you can play in helping our Nation to meet these challenges.

As I do so, I hope I can avoid either the undue optimism of a Pollyanna or the unwarranted pessimism of a modern Cassandra. Rather, I hope to approach my theme with the attitude a modern farmer goes about his business, bringing to my task the same practical outlook, the same careful weighing of assets and liabilities and the same refusal to be governed by either false hope or fearful gloom.

At the start, I should make clear that I am basically an optimist. In the past few months, I have had the opportunity to travel the length and breadth of our land and, once again, I was reassured by what I saw. We live in a marvelous country. As one leaves the hothouse atmosphere of Washington and goes out among the people, one cannot help but be deeply impressed by the basic strength of our country. That strength is reflected in our abundant resources, in their dynamic development, and, above all, in our energetic, freedom-loving and God-fearing people.

I have no fear for the future of such a nation and such a people. I believe they can meet and conquer any problem once they understand the nature of the problem and its significance.

It is in this area, the area of recognizing our problems, of understanding them and of choosing the right solutions, that we face our greatest challenge, and it is here where my basic feeling of optimism is tempered by a few nagging doubts. They are brought on by a number of warning signals in our economic and political life which we cannot afford to ignore any more than can the farmer when he finds the first evidence of disease in his livestock.

As a prospering, highly developed nation, we face the same danger which has confronted every successful nation or civilization since history began. Our danger is that, as we enjoy our strength and prosperity, we neglect, and thus weaken, those very institutions and principles which made us strong and prosperous and free. Our danger lies in complacency, selfishness, ignorance, and irresponsibility.

And, while my message today is that it need not happen here, let us not delude ourselves. It can happen here. Just because in our lifetime we have seen our Nation move from one plateau to the other, each higher than the last, until we now stand the greatest Nation in the world, let us not think that we cannot fall.

I have often thought that perhaps the first thing which should be taught in the civics and political science courses in our schools is the story of the decline and fall of the Roman Empire. The story of a nation which became the undisputed ruler of the world and then collapsed so utterly and so completely that it plunged the civilized world into darkness for centuries, should be studied by every American.

We would learn that just because an economy and a civilization rises to spectacular heights is no reason it is going to stay there.

We would learn that stupidity, selfishness, and ignorance on the part of the population and its rulers can bring on not just a temporary reversal but a collapse so complete as to wipe out the whole structure with all of its accomplishments. The Roman Empire collapsed because it became rotten within. It became rotten because the people and the government failed to preserve those virtues which had led to its strength and because its citizens refused to apply any restraint to their demands upon the government. Literally, the Roman Empire tore itself to pieces through the weakness and demagoguery of its rulers and the enormous burden of expenses they incurred in meeting the demands of a citizenry which forget the public interest in its selfish fight for the fruits of national prosperity.

The comparison between our Nation and the Roman Empire is not a perfect one, but we cannot ignore the warning signals which are flying today.

As a nation, in spite of the heaviest tax burden in its history, we appear to be constitutionally unable to restrain our expenditures below the level of our income. We have balanced our budget (lived within our income as a government) in only 5 out of the last 29 years. We appear unable to reduce our tremendous national debt which now stands at $290 billion. Interest on that debt alone amounts to $9 billion dollars each year which is more than our total annual expenditures for every purpose only 20 years ago. As a result of this profligacy with our national wealth, coupled with the selfish demands of the more highly organized segments of our economy, we are fighting a losing battle against inflation. The cost of goods and services is going up. The value of our money is going down. In that struggle the victims are those who are least able to protect themselves, including the farmers of our Nation. We are witnessing, as one result of inflation, a flow of gold from our country which has not yet become a flood but which carries grave implications for the future stability of our currency and confidence in it.

These results, however, grave though they may be, are but the symptoms of what I believe to be a far more serious defect in our national life. I refer to the growing tendency of our people, encouraged by demagogs whose only principle is a lust for power, to take the easy way out. We know, each of us in our own hearts and minds, that the right way is not always the easy way and that no nation which has consistently taken the path of least resistance, including the Roman Empire, has ever survived. The easy way, if it is the wrong way, leads only to the misery of retraced steps or the finality of disaster. Yet, what are our constantly recurring deficits, which is our huge debt, what is our inflated currency—if they are not the symptoms of a people and a nation which have fallen into the habit of taking the easy way out?

The hard way, we know, is to rely on our own individual initiative and self-reliance for the solution of our problems. The easy way is to pass these problems on to government. The easy way is for the local units to pass them on to the State government and for the State government, in turn, to pass them on to the Federal Government.

Too many of our politicians and self-appointed leaders seem to find it politically expedient to suggest that the solution to any problem should rest on government. And no politician has found it difficult, or has lost any votes, by suggesting that the solution for any State or local problem was the responsibility of the National Government. How simple and easy it is to shift responsibility to government. It is also much less risky, from the politicians' point of view, to remove a problem from the careful scrutiny of the folks back home and dump it in the legislative pit of the National Congress where its costs, complexities and waste are hidden in a multitude of other Federal activities.

This is the easy way to avoid responsibility. This is the path which our people are being encouraged to take by those who think more of the next election than they do of the next generation.

If you think I overstate the case, examine the proposals that are being advocated daily for the solution of most of our problems. Pass a Federal law, create a new agency, appropriate billions. That ends the problem. Let me give you one concrete example.

In my book, and I confess I may be old fashioned, it is the responsibility of each citizen, either as an individual or banded together with others in a local community, to take care of his personal refuse in a manner which will not endanger the welfare of his neighbors. At one time, in this Nation of ours, we felt it was the responsibility of local units of government to dispose of sewage created by their own citizens. This was a basic, essential function of the local government. That is no longer true. Those who prefer the easy way have won out and the National Government, along with the multitude of other problems confronting it, including the very survival of the Nation, now has been given the job of helping to build local sewage plants. It will shortly be costing the Federal Government over $100 million a year.

It is not a question of the need for the program or project. We all recognize, for example, the necesity for treatment of sewage and the need for preserving our water resources and protecting their cleanliness. The tragedy is that we have succumbed to what we have been led to think is the easy way of meeting a recognized need. The demagog has no difficulty in selling us on the idea of using Federal funds, which incidentally must be borrowed by a bankrupt Government, in preference to raising the funds locally, probably through increased taxes. There has been spread across our land the idea that there is some magic in Federal money and that its supply is somehow unlimited. The demagog is not concerned with the true facts of our precarious fiscal position. He is interested only in providing painless benefits for his greater glory.

The demagog, and those like him, have also discovered that it is easier to influence one legislative body, the Federal Congress, than it is 50 State legislatures or thousands of local governing bodies. He knows the National Government is further away from the close scrutiny of the people. He knows he can bring to bear on the National Legislature the heavy influence of powerful pressure groups. It is no coincidence that one of the reasons which the so-called liberal advances (but generally on the quiet) for Federal intervention is the rural influence in the State legislatures which tend to look upon his grandiose schemes with healthy skepticism.

The net result of deluding ourselves into believing that the easy way can safely be traveled is not alone the financial and fiscal difficulties it inevitably creates. In the process, we not only weaken our basic economic strength through lavish and uncontrollable expenditures, but we weaken ourselves as individuals and we weaken our local and State governments. Weakness and lack of power is the invariable consequence of the constant sloughing off of responsibility to someone else. If we choose to lose those attributes of self-reliance which made our Nation great, and if we choose to make figureheads of our local governments whose function, under our constitutional form of government is to help preserve our individual liberties, then we have laid the basis for the complete concentration of power in the Federal Government and its inevitable corruption into absolute tyranny.

We observe the same trend—the trend toward the easy way out—in other fields. It is perhaps most apparent in the one in which you are primarily interested—agriculture. It takes the form of seeking easy political solutions for tough economic problems. It is embodied in the successful effort of the demagog to convince us that we can safely substitute for the rigors of the marketplace the rockingchair complacency of governmental guarantees.

In agriculture, we have so entangled in politics the economic problems which confront our farmers that I often despair that we will ever unravel the mess which has been created. We have gone so far in the direction of political intervention that the main political effort is no longer directed toward the solution of the agricultural problem. It is aimed at achieving the maximum political benefit in partisan politics.

We have, for example, urgent and critical problems in the field of agriculture which should be acted upon during the next session of Congress. Yet, it would be a brave man who would predict to you today that any concrete legislation will be written into law in the election year of 1960. When the people of this Nation embarked upon political solutions for the problems of agriculture, it was truly a sorry day for the American farmer. No longer is the farmer his own master. He is instead either the beneficiary or the victim of political decisions over which he has less and less control.

I do not mean to give the impression that I believe government should play no role in the development and maintenance of a sound agricultural economy. The power of government, if wisely used, can assist and should assist in the orderly marketing of agricultural products by providing protection against radical changes in the market place. This, I believe, was the original conception of the price support program. We have moved far from that concept and we have been led by those who maintained that there was an easy way to agricultural prosperity. If support at orderly marketing levels can be justified, they told us, why not move on to ever higher levels? Let us disregard any self-restraint. Let us substitute government guarantees for the working of the cruel market place, they said, and their plea was again successful. The test of the successful farm politician then became which could offer the higher price supports and the test of the successful political party was its ability to fasten the blame for the inevitable cycle of rigid supports, price-depressing surpluses and price collapse upon its political opponents.

With the bankruptcy of the high price support program, the demagogs are now seeking another easy way out. The latest solution proposed by the Governor of one of our greatest agricultural States, is simplicity itself. He suggests that we simply ignore the market place entirely and guarantee each farmer a minimum income. Let me warn you that all the demagogs are not holding political office. There are some who have found their way into leadership in a certain farm organization with which you are acquainted. They are urging the same thing but camouflaged under such high-sounding names as "compensation payments," "deficiency payments," "stabilization payments," "equalization payments," etc. If some kind of income guarantee program should be adopted, and it is being seriously considered by important forces within the party which controls our National Legislature, then I can easily predict the next political contest. It will take the form of seeing which candidate in the farm areas can promise the highest minimum income. The other side of the coin is, of course, that it may also take the form of candidates from the urban areas engaged in a contest as to who can promise the lowest minimum farm income. In a nation where a vast majority of the population lives in urban areas, you can guess where this will leave the American farmer.

I wish I could stand here today and tell you I had an easy answer to the problems which confront American agriculture. Instead I must say I believe there is no easy answer. Before we get out of the mess we are now in, we have a long, hard road to travel and, before we can even begin to travel that road, we must come to the realization that the adjustment will be difficult and that it cannot be made if political rather than economic considerations are going to continue to dominate and dictate our decisions.

I have spoken pessimistically of the various aspects of what I have described as the tendency of a prosperous and successful people to rest on their oars, to avoid difficult decisions, and to take the easy way out of their difficulties. I have spoken of it in terms of our fiscal difficulties, in terms of its dangers to our liberties and, specifically, in terms of its relationship to the problem in which you are primarily interested. I have suggested that a continuation of this trend to its logical conclusion can only lead to the collapse of our Nation. I have said this collapse is possible, and I call to your attention, as another reminder, the work of the British historian, Toynbee, whose study led him to the conclusion that of the 26 major civilizations in world history, 16 are now dead and buried and the remaining 10 are rapidly losing their character.

But early in my remarks, I said I was an optimist, that I had great faith in the basic strength of our Nation and that, while it can happen here, it need not happen here. Whether it does or doesn't depends on you and me and every citizen in this land. It is up to us to determine whether we will continue to forever adopt the easy solution, the expedient answer and the least distasteful course of action, or whether we will pursue the right course, the sound solution and the intelligent program regardless of how difficult they may first appear to be.

Several centuries ago, the Italian poet, Dante, put it this way: "The hottest places in hell are reserved for those who, in a period of moral crisis, maintain their neutrality." My plea to you today, as leaders in a great national farm organization, is to discard your neutrality in this period of moral crisis and to enlist in the fight to preserve our Nation and its institutions.

But I would be derelict in my duty if I merely summoned you to battle and left it at that. Certainly, you are entitled to a knowledge of the nature of the struggle and to my ideas as to the kind of strategy and tactics which must be employed by those who choose to fight for the right rather than the easy way.

When I speak of a summons to battle, let me make clear what I mean. I call upon you, as individual leaders in your communities and in agriculture, and call upon your great organization to take part, with enthusiasm, with courage, and with determination, in the political life of our Nation. I do not refer to political theorizing or polite discussions on a high plane amongst yourselves; I refer to the down-to-earth, backbreaking job of nominating and electing candidates to political office. I refer to the only kind of political action which has any meaning if we are to reverse the trend I have described today. I refer to the defeat of those who oppose everything for which you stand through the victory of those who will work shoulder to shoulder with you on behalf of the principles which brought greatness to America.

I can give you one word of encouragement at the outset. It is my considered opinion, as one who has spent most of his life in American politics, that the principles of government in which you believe are held by a majority of the American people. If the cause of commonsense conservatism, with its dynamic urge to preserve the best American institutions, has suffered in recent years, it has not been because of any change in the basic philosophy of the majority of Americans. It has come about instead because radicalism and the proponents of the easy way have done a vastly better job of mobilizing their strength and in hammering home their something-for-nothing philosophy. You know that is so without my telling you. The really effective political action groups in this Nation are in radical hands. They are working the soil which produces the most abundant harvest. They are developing and electing candidates who will promote their viewpoint. The radical farm leader, the union boss, the leftwing political leader, have all developed highly effective political organizations which are producing results when the votes are counted. While I violently disagree with their philosophy and with many of their ruthless methods, I am not one to stand on the sidelines and criticize their activities. Fundamentally, they are doing what every citizen should do in a representative republic. They are taking part in the basic process of representative government. They are electing officeholders who will advance their views and the answer to this activity is not criticism. The answer to radical political action is conservative counteraction, and the sooner we realize that fact the sooner we can restore the balance of power in our internal political life.

What I am saying, I believe, has particular meaning for you and your splendid organization. I hold you in high regard, but I would be less than a friend if I did not ask you frankly today whether the American Farm Bureau Federation has not, in the crucial struggle for the preservation of our institutions, taken the easy way out by an excessive preoccupation with political neutrality? That is a question which every conservative group in our Nation should now be asking itself.

I have said here today, and I know it is a basic tenet of your beliefs, that we must remove the agriculture problem from politics. Yet, I frankly tell you today that you will never get politics out of agriculture until agriculture gets into politics with both feet.

Let me put it another way—and I believe this most sincerely—the farmer must get into politics to get politics out of farming.

We hear a lot about parity. There is certainly a lot of politics in parity but then there is also such a thing as parity in politics.

Political parity cannot be achieved by well-meaning attempts to influence men who have already been elected to office. That is the easy way, but, unfortunately, like many other expedient methods, it just does not work. The finest feed ever produced will not sprout if it is sown in a bed of concrete. Your efforts to achieve political parity cannot be harvested in the legislature unless you have prepared the soil in the precincts at home.

Frankly those who believe like the Farm Bureau have been less than diligent in assuring that they and their views maintained parity in politics, and the battle is being lost.

Let me be specific. The most important agricultural bill before the Congress was the omnibus farm bill, H.R. 12954. This was opposed by the Farm Bureau. The Secretary of Agriculture labeled the bill an "economic monstrosity." Do you know that 55 of the Members of the House who voted in accord with the policy of the Farm Bureau on this legislation were not Members of the House the next year. That's over 12 percent loss. In the Senate last year probably the most important agriculture bill was Senate Joint Resolution 162. The Farm Bureau opposed this measure. Of those supporting the Farm Bureau position, 15 or 15 percent were not around when the new Congress convened last January. Now, I'm not analyzing the reasons these Congressmen and Senators weren't back. Suffice it to say that they weren't.

If you think the vote of a few Congressmen or a couple of Senators isn't important, let me point out that in this last session, the McClellan amendment providing a bill of rights for labor in the labor bill was adopted by a vote of 47 to 46. Only 1 vote difference between legislation that had some meaning as against a gesture, and in the House of Representatives the vote on substituting the Landrum-Griffin bill for the weak committee bill was 201 to 229—only 28 votes difference between an effective bill and a tap on the wrist.

But let me get back to my point. You are losing your parity in politics.

What is called for, I sincerely believe, is a decision on your part, both as individuals and as members of the Farm Bureau, to renounce political neutrality during elections and to bring your entire individual and organizational strength to bear on behalf of candidates who meet your rigid specifications of honor and outlook.

As individuals, you have the responsibility and duty to become actively engaged in partisan politics. I am not here as a recruiter for the Republican Party, although I will be glad to take membership applications at the door. What I am saying is that you cannot, as individuals, expect to achieve concrete political results if you are unwilling to join and work for the party of your choice. It is only within a party that you can help to determine party policy, help select candidates for party nomination and work for their eventual election. It is only within a political party that you can till and fertilize the soil which will produce the kind of legislators who will, for example, get the farm problem out of politics. I can count on the fingers of one hand the number of farm bureau members in my district who are working actively in a political party and the same goes for farm bureau leaders in my State. If this is true across the land, then I say the Farm Bureau Federation has no complaint when it finds the halls of our legislatures slowly filling up with those whose views are diametrically opposed to its own.

I will go even further and say that, beyond your clear call to duty as individuals, your federation, if it hopes to be effective in promoting its program, must take an active interest, as an organization, in the nomination and election of legislative candidates. You can deliberate in this convention and devise the finest program in the world and all of your efforts will go for naught if your organization is willing to stand on the sidelines and permit the election of legislators who are diametrically opposed to your basic philosophies. The day has long since passed when you can confine your political efforts to education after the elections have been held. How, I ask you, can even the most efficient Washington staff sell farm bureau philosophy to a Congressman who owes his allegiance to Walter Reuther or Jim Patton? I think your Washington staff has been doing a splendid job but you give them an impossible job if you do not also play your fullest part in trying to send to the Congress men who will work with your Shumans, Flemings, Lynns, and Triggs, rather than working against them.

I am not suggesting that your organization become the farm branch of one of our political parties. I hope, however, that I have made it crystal clear that I believe your organization cannot afford to be neutral in any political contest where one candidate is for and the other against everything for which you stand. Nor indeed, do I see much hope for America if our best citizens and our most respected groups stand smugly aside while the real struggle is being fought and permit victory by default for those whose policies can lead only to the collapse of our Nation.

The 18th century British statesman, Edmund Burke, said: "All that is necessary for the triumph of evil is that good men do nothing." He also said that "the people never give up their liberties but under some delusion." The gravest danger confronting our Nation today is that the people delude themselves into believing there is an easy way out of all their difficulties. The triumph of such evil can only come about if good men stand idly by. Let it never be said that you and I were among those who, in a period of moral crisis, maintained our neutrality and did nothing.

New York State Banking Laws

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 7, 1960

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, in the forthcoming session of the New York State Legislature, efforts will again be made by a few giant New York City banks to amend the State banking law so as to eliminate the State branch bank district lines that have safeguarded competitive independent banking in this State.

A concurrent effort will be made by the same group to prevent the New York

Legislature from continuing the legislative freeze on bank holding company expansion within the State.

For your information I have prepared a statement on this subject. The statement demonstrates that if independent banking, through the competition of numerous small unit banks, is to be preserved in New York State and a monopoly in banking avoided, we must assure, one, that the present branch bank district lines are not changed; and, two, that the current freeze against the expansion of bank holding company operations is continued. I do hope that you will find this statement helpful in your consideration of this most important problem.

The statement follows:

STATEMENT BY REPRESENTATIVE EMANUEL CELLER, CHAIRMAN OF THE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY, U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES ON PROPOSED CHANGE IN NEW YORK STATE BANKING LAWS

In recent years the giant New York City banks annually have sought to amend the law and eliminate the State branch bank district lines that have safeguarded competitive independent banking in this State. Every year these big city banks have sought, thus far unsuccessfully, authority to extend their dominion over all of the New York State banking business. They try to do this either through vastly expanded branch banking operations, or, in the alternative, through the use of the bank holding company device to operate by means of a multitude of subsidiaries throughout the State.

It is certain that their efforts will be repeated in the coming session. Both Governor Rockefeller and his assistant, G. Russell Clark, the State superintendent of banks, announced shortly after the State senate rejected on March 24, 1959, last year's omnibus bank bill, that bank legislation would be given first priority.

Another aspect in the banking picture is equally important. The current freeze on bank holding company expansion, which the New York Legislature has imposed since January 29, 1957, is due to expire on February 14, 1960. If nothing is done, if prompt action is not taken, the large New York City banks will be in a position, through the holding company device, to swallow up all of the little banks in the State.

In my considered judgment continuation of independent banking in New York State is dependent upon (1) the defeat of any bill that would change the present State branch district lines, and (2) the passage of a bill that would extend the current legislative freeze on bank holding company expansion.

BRANCH BANK DISTRICT LINES

The banking system of New York State traditionally has relied for its vitality on vigorous competition by a multitude of independent banks, locally organized, locally financed, and locally managed. Nevertheless, there has been in recent years a discernible trend in New York State toward concentration of the banking business into fewer and larger hands. Indeed, in New York City, the four largest banks now control over 60 percent of all commercial bank assets. What is more, the two largest—Chase Manhattan and First National City—control almost 42 percent of the city's banking assets.

Present statutory branch bank district lines were drawn in 1934 in the shadow of the bank holiday in order to arrest undue concentration of banking facilities. The single most important reason for such geographical restrictions was to prevent banks with head offices in New York City from establishing branches in the suburban counties of Westchester, Nassau, and Suffolk and thus to protect independent unit banks outside of New York City from the encroachment of the giant money market institutions located in the city.

In addition, it was felt that control and ownership would not and could not meet the needs of the community as efficiently as locally owned and operated banks. This is as true today as it was in 1934 when the branch bank district lines were first established.

Owing to the increase in concentration among the city's banking institutions in the past 20 years, it is even more important now to guard against the encroachment that the big banks desire. There seems to be little doubt that if giant banks in New York City are allowed to penetrate into the suburban areas, the small unit banks there would be placed in far greater jeopardy. For one thing, their means of competing would be hardly comparable to those available to their huge city rivals. Indeed, to suppose that entry by the giant financial institutions of New York City into the suburban areas might have no adverse competitive effect on the independent banks located in these areas is to suppose that a chicken could dance with an elephant and come out unharmed. With the present district line obliterated, the suburban banking communities would soon be transformed into an area overwhelmingly dominated by a few large city institutions.

Last year the legislature rejected the omnibus bank bill which would have obliterated the branch bank district lines between New York City and the outlying suburban areas of Nassau, Suffolk, and Westchester Counties. This change would have permitted branch bank expansion throughout the entire new district. It is essential that we assure that this type of legislation or some similar legislation does not get enacted during the next session of the State legislature.

EXPANSION OF BANK HOLDING COMPANIES

State branch bank district lines can also be circumvented and their safeguards against banking monopoly destroyed through the use of the bank holding company device. Geographic limitations can be avoided by the simple expedient of forming a holding company to acquire control of banks throughout a State without regard to district lines.

This whole issue of holding company circumvention of branch lines came dramatically to life in New York State when the First National City Bank applied to the Federal Reserve Board for permission to form the largest bank holding company in the Nation. Initial objective of First National City was to acquire control of the County Trust Co., of White Plains, N.Y., the dominant commercial bank in Westchester County, and thus pierce the branch line separating New York City and Westchester. In short, through the device of forming a holding company, the same management which was restricted in its operation under a bank charter to New York City, sought to acquire a unit bank in another district, operate it in the same manner a branch would be operated, and flout the expressed will of the legislative body of New York State regarding the establishment of banks. Moreover, there was every prospect that the First National City Bank plan would initiate a chain reaction until ultimately a handful of giant New York City banks, through the holding company device, would be in control of nearly every sizable bank in the State of New York. Success of the plan would have meant that the day of independent unit and regional banking would have passed and that money and credit in New York State would be largely controlled by a few gigantic banking institutions.

For these reasons, I testified at length before the Federal Reserve Board calling attention to the alarming competitive consequences of the proposal. You will recall that the Federal Reserve Board after hearing exhaustive testimony on this proposal by all affected parties, concluded that approval of such transaction would be detrimental to competition and contrary to public interest.

In addition, I testified in the early part of January 1957 before the State of New York Joint Legislative Committee To Revise the Banking Laws and pointed out the necessity of amending the State's banking laws to prohibit any bank holding company from acquiring in the future any bank located outside the district prescribed for branch banks.

It is gratifying that Governor Harriman and the New York Legislature recognized the threat to the State banking structure implied in the First National City plan. This was evidenced by adoption on January 29, 1957, of stopgap legislation, effective until May 1, 1957, prohibiting any bank holding company from acquiring a bank located outside the branch banking district. It has been reaffirmed by subsequent legislative approval of measures extending this legislation until February 16, 1960.

It must be remembered that the proposal to expand bank holding company operation seeks to employ an ingenious device to accomplish indirectly that which is prohibited by the State in establishing branch district lines. It thus effectively dissolves bank district lines.

It is my view that practically speaking a holding company system is a substitute for a branch system and the difference between branch banks and subsidiary banks in a holding company system is a difference without a distinction. Bank holding company groups and branch banking systems both accomplish the same thing—the operation of a number of banking units under one control and management.

You will recall that the omnibus bank bill, which the legislature rejected last year, would have established two bank holding districts in the State, the first consisting of New York City, Long Island, and Westchester and Rockland Counties, the second of the balance of the State. That bill would have allowed a bank holding company to acquire banks anywhere within the district. Beyond that the bill would have permitted a holding company formed by a bank in the second district to acquire banks in the first district if the first district banks constituted 45 percent or less of the holding company's total assets.

If the State legislature had ratified this bill, as Governor Harriman previously had stated, on November 20, 1956, there would have been "ignited what may be the greatest chain reaction in recent banking history" the effects of which "will go to the very roots of the entire banking structure of New York State" with the "distinct possibility" of "concentration of banking assets in the hands of a few institutions."

In his comments on a holding company proposal similar to the one in the omnibus bank bill, Mr. George A. Mooney, the former superintendent of banks of the State of New York, had this to say on December 12, 1956:

"The very existence of a number of large bank holding companies would create competition amongst them for future expansion in other communities. If the many unit banks found it impossible to resist the holding company movement, we could expect in short order a heavy concentration of banking assets, facilities, and credit in a handful of giant statewide bank holding company systems."

The argument has been advanced that if future bank holding company expansions are to be limited to branch district lines, the effect would be to create a monopoly for the Marine Midland banking system. I am not aware that this system constitutes a serious threat to the competitive banking system of New York. But if this is, or even threatens to be the case, legislation limiting bank holding company acquisition to branch districts, could well be made applicable to the existing Marine Midland system.

The fact that no such suggestion has been made gives rise to the conclusion that existence of the Marine Midland group is seized upon as an excuse for permitting statewide expansion of banks through the holding company device. Moreover, the problem raised is not a new one by any means. Congress was faced with an essentially similar problem in connection with a provision in the bank holding company bill prohibiting future interstate expansion by bank holding groups. The act as adopted, you will recall, does not affect interstate acquisition of banks by holding companies which were completed prior to the act's passage. Therefore, a bank holding company's interstate status, accomplished prior to the act's adoption, is frozen.

To follow the rationale advanced here to its logical conclusion, once a company obtains dominance, no action of any kind should be taken against other companies which attempt to obtain similar monopoly status. If this contention were to be followed by the Congress, no action would have been taken in December 1950 to adopt the Celler-Kefauver Anti-Merger Act, which you will recall, amends section 7 of the Clayton Act to forbid corporate mergers, regardless of how accomplished, where the effect may be substantially to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly. And if this contention were to be followed, the Federal Government would have taken no action to prevent the Bethlehem-Youngstown merger on the basis that the United States Steel Corp. has assets exceeding the combined assets of the merging companies.

It may also be noted that a number of States, including Illinois and Georgia, have enacted legislation recently, prohibiting bank holding company groups from acquiring 15 percent or more of the voting stock of each of two or more banks. Again, such legislation does not apply to stock of bank holding companies acquired prior to passage of the measure.

It has also been contended that unless bank holding companies are permitted to expand on a statewide basis, the hands of supervisory authorities would be tied in any future period of economic decline. It is stated that if weak points in the banking structure developed in a district in which there was no bank strong enough to acquire the failing institution, the supervisor would not be able to call in a holding company from another district.

What must be recognized is that the situation today is entirely unlike that which existed during the last bank depression. Today, the FDIC Act and other measures adopted in the middle or late 1930's, serve to insulate depositors from financial loss. In any event, if this is now a matter of serious concern, there is no reason why legislation limiting bank holding companies to the geographic area in which banks are permitted to operate branches, could not contain an exception so as to allow a holding company in appropriate cases to acquire a bank in another district, if this is necessary to save a failing institution. It is one thing to incorporate such an escape clause in legislation. It is quite another to seize upon the failing bank argument to justify statewide expansion of bank holding companies.

One final point needs comment. It has been contended by advocates for certain city banks that the Federal Bank Holding Company Act of 1956 has preempted the field and that there is no area for permissible State action in respect of bank holding companies. The argument, in short, is that continuation of the State freeze on bank holding company expansion is futile in light of the Federal statute. This, it is evident, is entirely fallacious.

The provisions of the Bank Holding Company Act coupled with its legislative history make it crystal clear that there has been reserved to the States wide latitude to adopt appropriate bank holding legislation. Thus, section 7 of the Bank Holding Company Act specifies that "the enactment by the Congress of the Bank Holding Company Act of 1956 shall not be construed as preventing any State from exercising such powers and jurisdiction which it now has or may hereafter have with respect to banks, bank holding companies, and subsidiaries thereof."

I turn to legislative history which explains in detail what that section means. The report of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee[1] makes this comment:

"Another provision of this bill expressly preserves to the States a right to be more restrictive regarding the formation or operation of bank holding companies within their respective borders than the Federal authorities can be or are under this bill. Under such a grant of authority each State may, within the limits of its proper jurisdictional authority, be more severe on bank holding companies as a class than (1) this bill empowers the Federal authorities to be or (2) such Federal authorities actually are in their administration of the provisions of this bill. In the opinion of the committee this provision adequately safeguards States rights as to bank holding companies."

Beyond that, Senator ROBERTSON, sponsor of the legislation in the Senate and chairman of the Banking and Currency Subcommittee which considered the measure, pointed out in Senate debate that "each State may * * * enact legislation to regulate bank holding companies."[2] As an example of the type of legislation States were empowered to enact, Senator ROBERTSON inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the text of a bank holding bill recently passed by the Georgia Legislature,[3] preventing any bank holding company incorporated under State law or doing business in the State, from acquiring 15 percent or more of the voting stock of each of two or more banks. Illinois enacted similar legislation.[4]

The decision of the Federal Reserve Board on July 10, 1958, denying the application of the First National City Bank to establish a holding company to acquire the County Trust Co. of Westchester, in nowise derogates from these conclusions. On the contrary, the Federal Reserve Board made it clear in its decision that it assumed the validity of the New York State freeze on bank holding company expansion. The Board ruled on the merits of the application holding that while the validity of the New York State statute freezing bank holding company expansion must be assumed, that statute was temporary in nature and there was not certainty that it would be further extended beyond its expiration date. The following excerpts from the opinion of the Federal Reserve Board in the First National City matter are relevant in this connection:

"The extent of the 'power and jurisdiction' of the States in the field of bank holding company regulation is, of course, not a matter for this Board's decision; nor may the Board undertake to determine whether the New York statute represents a valid exercise of that States power. These are matters for determination by the courts. Unless and until a court of competent jurisdiction holds the New York statute to be invalid, the Board must assume its validity."

The foregoing makes it clear that the Federal Bank Holding Company Act in nowise precludes the New York State Legislature from continuing the present freeze on bank holding company expansion.

Library of Congress Gives History of Makeup of the American $1 Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE DOYLE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 7, 1960

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, for years before I first came to this Congress about 14 years ago I was interested in the makeup of the American dollar bill. That interest continued and increased until recently I asked the Library of Congress to answer my letter of August 10, 1959, copy of which is hereinafter set forth, about the American dollar bill. I believe it of such common interest and information among the American people that I am herewith presenting the report of the Library of Congress.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., August 10, 1959.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS,
Legislative Reference Service,
Washington, D.C.

My DEAR FRIENDS: Will you please send to me, in duplicate please, a statement which I can insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD—or otherwise use—as to the history and significance and why are they used, etc., of each of the items appearing on the face of the $1 bill of the United States of America, and on the reverse side thereof. For instance, the great seal of the United States. Why is the pyramid there? What does the wording mean and what language is it?

Make it as clear and complete as you can so that folks reading it can sort of get the picture of what it is and why.

Thank you.

Sincerely yours,

CLYDE DOYLE,
Member of Congress.

THE AMERICAN $1 BILL

Over 150 years ago, Benjamin Franklin, colonial champion of liberty and freedom, observed that "in this world nothing can be said to be certain, except death and taxes." This famous inventor, statesman, and philosopher could not possibly have foreseen that the new Nation—to whose creation he had contributed so much—would develop such basically sound currency. The first United States paper currency—the demand notes—were issued in 1861. These demand notes and most other issues since that time are still legal tender at their face value. Some issues will actually be redeemed by the Government at higher than face value.

The preservation of the integrity of American currency has been fostered through sustained faith in the solemn word of the Government, as well as the specie supporting it. The Secret Service of the Treasury Department guards and protects against any losses through counterfeiting; and a system of strict internal checks is maintained at the Bureau of Engraving to pinpoint the responsibility of each operating section. Special ink, prepared within the Bureau, is used for printing all bills. The currency paper, composed of 50 percent cotton and 50 percent linen embedded with small red and blue fibers, is a special formula paper produced by a commercial establishment under close Government supervision. You can be sure that the statement on our currency—"This certificate is legal tender for all debts, public and private"—is more than a slogan—it is an oft-proved fact.

Some of the design features of our $1 bill, and other paper currency, are purely ornamental. Others are devised as security checks, and still others are ornamental but also protect against counterfeiting. For example, the etched borders (known as the conventional geometrical lathe design) around both the face and the reverse side of a $1 bill are attractively intricate in design—it would not be easy to duplicate the pattern in the design. The word "one" and the arabic numeral "1" appear numerous times on both the face and the reverse of the $1 bill adding to the attractiveness of the design, but also acting as a safeguard. On our $1 bill the designation "one" in varying form, can be found in 25 instances. On the face, or obverse side, "one dollar" appears twice; there are 8 notations of "one" and five arabic numerals "1". On the reverse side of the $1 bill the notation "one dollar" appears once; "one" is noted 5 times and the arabic numeral "1" appears 4 times.

All U.S. paper currency is printed in black ink on the obverse and green ink on the reverse, regardless of denomination. The serial number of the bills appears twice, in blue ink, on the face of the bill; once, to the upper right of the centered portrait of George Washington; and once, to the lower left of the portrait. A series note, the date bill, and other paper currency are small lettering to the left of the portrait.

The items enumerated above, along with the designations, silver certificate, "This certifies that there is on deposit in the Treasury of the United States of America one dollar in silver payable to the bearer on demand," and the signatures of Secretary of the Treasury and the Treasurer; all testify to the denomination of the currency and to the authority of the issuing body, but they do not have any particular historical significance.

On the other hand, there are some items with historical interest and meaning. Among these is the great seal of the Treasury. This seal is found in one form or another on every piece of paper money issued since the demand notes of 1861. Older than the Constitution of the United States, it has been affixed to official Treasury documents since 1782, although the exact date of adoption is not known.

Working as a committee, John Witherspoon—a New Jersey educator, Gouverneur Morris—Pennsylvania statesman and one of the signers of the Constitution; and Richard Henry Lee—Virginia statesman and great-grandfather of Gen. Robert E. Lee, supervised the design of the great seal of the Treasury. Some historians give full credit for the design to Gouverneur Morris, but the Treasury Department credits all three men with the creation of the seal.

The resulting design consists of a shield bearing the scales of justice; a key, symbolizing official authority; and 13 stars representing the original States. The seal is enclosed by a circle which bears the Latin legend—"Thesaur. Amer. Septent. Sigil.", an abbreviation of "Thesauri Americae Septentrionalis Sigillum"—"The Great Seal of the Treasury of North America." All silver certificates ($1, $5, and $10 denominations) carry the seal stamped in blue, immediately to the right of the appropriate portrait. U.S. $2 and $5 notes carry the seal in the same position, in red. The $100,000 gold certificate seal is stamped in yellow and the seal on the $5 to $10,000 Federal Reserve notes appears in green. On each denomination a different portrait appears, but the same Treasury seal—in the colors noted—is an integral part of every piece of paper currency.

Beginning with bills issued in 1935, $1 silver certificates have carried the obverse and reverse of the great seal of the United States. Unlike the great seal of the Treasury which appears on all paper money, the great seal of the United States is found only on $1 silver certificates.

Everyone is familiar with the American eagle as a national emblem of the United States. Since ancient times, the eagle's form has been utilized in art and symbolism. Ancient Roman armies used the eagle as a standard and early Christian art used the eagle to personify St. John, the evangelist. To this day, the eagle remains a symbol of war and triumphal trophies. The face of the great seal of the United States is built around the American eagle.

History does not record the date or time when the eagle was first used as a symbol of our Republic, but it appeared on several versions of the great seal which were submitted to conform with the Founding Fathers' resolution of 1776—"That Dr. Franklin, Mr. J. Adams, and Mr. Jefferson, be a committee to bring in a device for a seal for the United States of America."

On June 19, 1782, William Barton, artist and heraldry expert of Philadelphia, presented the completed replica of the seal, having modified the artwork and description turned over to him by Charles Thomson, Secretary of Congress. The final version of the great seal of the United States as we know it today, was presented to Congress by Mr. Thomson on June 20, 1782, and accepted on that same day. Mr. Thomson had been designated to review and revise the entire collection of proposals submitted to the Congress for approval. Thus, these two men are credited with utilizing to the best advantage all of the various ideas submitted by the many minds and hands having a part in the creation of the great seal of the United States. The great seal was again ratified after the Constitution was adopted in 1789.

The reasons for the use of the symbols found on the seal set forth in the authors', Thomson and Barton, explanation of the design are particularly interesting. Mr. Barton noted that the 13 vertical stripes appearing on the eagle's shield (which are red and white on the full color seal) represent the 13 States supporting the blue chief "which unites the whole and represents Congress." In other words, it is the union of the Thirteen Original States under Congress. The eagle appears in what is termed as the "displayed" attitude; that is, with wings and feet spread. Mr. Barton explained that the displayed eagle reflected the fact that "the American States need no supporters but their own virtue, and the preservation of their Union through Congress."

The eagle grasps an olive branch in its right talon; and a bundle of 13 arrows in the left talon—denoting the power of peace and war. From the beak of the eagle a streamer flows which carries the Latin words, E Pluribus Unum, "Out of many, one." For the crest, which is a basic part of any coat of arms, a circular field containing 13 stars appears above the head of the eagle. The description of this crest is graphically described in the law regarding the design of the seal. It reads thus:

"For the crest. Over the head of the eagle, which appears above the escutcheon, a glory, or a breaking through a cloud, proper, and surrounding 13 stars, forming a constellation, argent, on an azure field."

With regard to the reverse side of the seal the law reads as follows:

"Reverse. A pyramid unfinished. In the zenith, an eye in a triangle, surrounded with a glory proper. Over the eyes these words, 'Annuit Coeptis.' On the base of the pyramid the numerical letters MDCCLXXVI. And underneath the following motto, 'Novus Ordo Seclorum.'"

It was the thought of the authors, Thomson and Barton, that the unfinished pyramid represent strength and duration, and that the eye represent the eye of Providence. The Latin phrase Annuit Coeptis, translated means "He [God] has favored our undertaking." The phrase Novus Ordo Seclorum, means "A new order of the ages."

In the broadest sense, money is but a representation of wealth. The paper on which it is printed has virtually no intrinsic worth—its value comes from the fact that by common consent it can be exchanged for something of value, such as an automobile or food. By common consent and the solemn faith in the word of our Government the American $1 bill is a reliable medium of exchange, not only in the United States but throughout the world.

Correspondence on U.S.-U.S.S.R. Cooperation in Outer Space Exploration

OF

HON. VICTOR L. ANFUSO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 7, 1960

Mr. ANFUSO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to insert into the RECORD a series of letters and correspondence which I had in recent weeks. It deals with a most important subject, namely, cooperation between the United States and the U.S.S.R. in the peaceful exploration and uses of outer space.

As a member of the House Committee on Science and Astronautics and chairman of its Subcommittee on International Cooperation and Security, I am strongly of the opinion that such cooperation be established for the purpose of peaceful exploration of outer space. All of mankind stands to benefit immeasurably by international cooperation in this field, while the lack of such cooperation contains the seed of humanity's destruction at some future date.

The world today both fears and yet depends on the United States and the U.S.S.R. for guidance in the new space age. Both of these nations working separately would not only bankrupt each other, but may ultimately bring destruction upon themselves and the rest of mankind. Working together, in a spirit of cooperation, they can help bring about a better life on earth for all peoples. Together they can explore and exploit outer space for the benefit of all mankind, so that no one on earth need ever be in want.

Working in unison in this field, the United States and the U.S.S.R. can make a joint contribution to strengthen the permanent committee of the United Nations and eventually bring all nations into a world program of outer space research and ultimate expansion toward other planets of the universe, thus guaranteeing an abundant life for all peoples.

Mr. Speaker, briefly stated, joint U.S.-U.S.S.R. cooperation in outer space exploration would accomplish the following:

First. It would accelerate progress in space exploration.

Second. It would save billions of dollars for both countries which could then be diverted to education and raising the standard of living of all peoples of the world, provided it is undertaken as a joint or multilateral operation.

Third. It would prevent waste and unnecessary duplication of effort.

Fourth. It would make possible an exchange program of scientists specializing in the field of outer space exploration.

Fifth. Better safety measures could be developed and applied.

Sixth. Joint outer space operations could be undertaken, as was done to some extent in the Antarctic during the International Geophysical Year projects. Among such joint operations could be the following: Sending a man or a team of men to make a landing on the moon; research of cosmic rays; worldwide communications; weather control; exploration of other planets; safe travel through space and safe reentry into the earth's atmosphere, and others.

In the meantime, our own research program in this field must continue so that we can catch up and surpass the achievements of the Russians, which would enable us to have a stronger position in our negotiations with them and in our efforts to obtain the kind of joint or multilateral cooperation which would provide and assure peace.

I urge our Government, through the Department of State and in cooperation with the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, to enter into immediate negotiations with the Russians on the peaceful exploration and uses of outer space.

Included in the correspondence which I am today inserting into the RECORD is a reply to me from the Chargé d'Affaires of the U.S.S.R. Embassy in Washington, Mr. M. N. Smirnovsky, which seems to me to be a clear indication that the U.S.S.R. is ready for such negotiation. The letter specifically states:

> The Soviet Government regards favorably the idea of concluding a bilateral agreement on peaceful uses of outer space. If the Soviet Union receives definite proposals to start negotiations on this question, we will be prepared to express our attitude toward them. The Soviet Union is ready to cooperate not only on a multilateral basis, as in the U.N. Committee, but also on a bilateral basis, when such cooperation is based on mutually advantageous conditions.

Following is the text of the letters in the exchange of correspondence in the matter:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington D.C., December 15, 1959.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: First, I want to thank you for your recent reply to my letter of August 26, 1959, on international cooperation on the peaceful uses of outer space within the framework of the United Nations. I am glad to note that progress is being made in this direction.

I was also pleased to learn that on November 24, 1959, the United States and the Soviet Union officially entered into an agreement for a cooperative program of nuclear research. This step augurs well for the future of mankind, and both countries deserve to be commended for it.

As a member of the House of Representatives Committee on Science and Astronautics and chairman of its Subcommittee on International Cooperation and Security, it seems perfectly logical to me that these two nations should extend their cooperation into the field of outer space. Let us apply the same spirit of cooperation as exemplified in the agreement reached in nuclear research toward the attainment of a United States-Soviet Union agreement on the peaceful uses of outer space.

Under such an agreement, it is not too difficult to visualize the early exchange of scientists who are specializing in the exploration of outer space, as well as an exchange of research information in this field. Similarly, the two nations can jointly undertake specific research projects of various kinds, such as the launching of satellites to sample certain physical phenomena of the universe, the establishment of joint tracking stations to keep flight articles under continued observation, joint operations in regaining control of space capsules returning to earth and their safe reentry into the earth's atmosphere; later, when man is introduced into the space environment, there could be joint logistic support for control and recovery operations and similar other joint efforts.

Such an arrangement would be most advantageous to both countries. At the present time, each country is conducting a vast research program of its own, which is costly, time consuming, and a duplication of effort. Naturally, such duplication is a great waste of money, effort, and brains, much of which can be saved if the scientific plans and projects in outer space undertaken by the two countries can be fully coordinated. There is no doubt that progress in space exploration would be greatly accelerated through such international cooperation between the United States and the Soviet Union.

I should further like to propose that the information obtained by our two countries regarding outer space be made available to other interested nations as a mark of our peaceful intentions and our desire to make available to mankind whatever benefits may accrue from this cooperative program.

I earnestly urge you to give full consideration to these proposals and to request the responsible officials in both countries to undertake early negotiations toward the attainment of an agreement on the peaceful uses of outer space.

The same letter is being forwarded to Premier Nikita S. Khrushchev, of the U.S.S.R.

Respectfully yours,

VICTOR L. ANFUSO,
Member of Congress.

Premier NIKITA S. KHRUSHCHEV,

DEAR MR. PREMIER: First, I want to thank you for your recent reply to my letter of August 26, 1959, on international cooperation on the peaceful uses of outer space, within the framework of the United Nations. I am glad to note that progress is being made in this direction.

DECEMBER 15, 1959.

Dr. T. KEITH GLENNAN,
Administrator, National Aeronautics and Space Administration, Washington, D.C.

DEAR KEITH: I not only approve, but will vigorously support, your request for more funds to increase our efforts in the space program. You know that I opposed cuts last year which have unquestionably retarded our progress.

I sincerely hope that you will use some of the money to expand your international cooperation section, because I am convinced that money alone in an all-out race into space will not solve the problem. In such a race, without international cooperation, we could impoverish our Nation, without attaining the peace and the strength we desire.

I fought for international cooperation in the establishment of a permanent committee for that purpose within the United Nations. I am glad to see progress being made in that direction. I am now following the same procedure to seek a joint agreement between the United States and the U.S.S.R. in the peaceful uses of outer space by writing to both President Eisenhower and Premier Khrushchev.

The only way I know of attaining peace is working for peace. If the two nations which have made the greatest advances in the exploration of outer space work together by directing their discoveries toward peaceful uses, which can create a world of abundance and bring all nations closer together, then the number of experiments in outer space could be expanded and at the same time result in savings of billions of dollars.

I want to develop this idea with you in hearings before my subcommittee.

With best wishes for a more fruitful new year, I am,

Sincerely,

VICTOR L. ANFUSO,
Member of Congress.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, December 17, 1959.

The Honorable VICTOR L. ANFUSO,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR VIC: In the President's absence, this will acknowledge your December 15 letter in further regard to international cooperation on the peaceful uses of outer space.

Your interest in the advancement of space exploration is appreciated, and you may be sure that the specific proposals you set forth in your letter on this subject will have consideration.

With kind regards.

JACK Z. ANDERSON,

NATIONAL AERONAUTICS AND SPACE ADMINISTRATION,
OFFICE OF THE ADMINISTRATOR,
Washington, D.C., December 17, 1959.

The Honorable VICTOR L. ANFUSO,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR VICTOR: Thanks so much for your thoughtful letter of December 15. I am sure that you will be interested in the progress we have made in developing a program of international cooperation. We will be happy to discuss this in hearings before your subcommittee and with you personally before that date if you so desire. Naturally, I am grateful for your vigorous support of the total space program. Only with congressional interest and support can we make the progress which we must make in this area of national endeavor.

Kindest personal regards and best wishes for the holiday season.

Sincerely,

T. KEITH GLENNAN,

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 31, 1959.

The Honorable VICTOR L. ANFUSO,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. ANFUSO: I refer to your letter of December 15 to the President discussing the possibility of cooperation with the Soviet Union in the field of outer space. In this connection, it is significant that during the recent session of the United Nations General Assembly, the United States and the Soviet Union reached agreement concerning participation in a new United Nations Committee on the Peaceful Uses of Outer Space and in an international scientific conference to be held under United Nations auspices during 1960 or 1961. Further, on an informal technical basis, exploratory talks were conducted by scientists of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration and Soviet scientists during a visit by the latter to this country in November. Technical talks have also been held with scientists of a number of other countries. Such steps as these should provide the basis for an increasing degree of international cooperation in outer space activities.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM B. MACOMBER, Jr.,
Assistant Secretary.

UNOFFICIAL TRANSLATION
DECEMBER 31, 1959.

DEAR MR. ANFUSO: In response to your letter of December 15, 1959, addressed to N. S. Khrushchev, Chairman of the U.S.S.R. Council of Ministers, I have been instructed to inform you of the following:

The Soviet Government and its head N. S. Khrushchev appreciate your efforts toward further development of cooperation between our two countries.

The Soviet Government regards favorably the idea of concluding a bilateral agreement on peaceful uses of outer space. If the Soviet Union receives definite proposals to start negotiations on this question, we will be prepared to express our attitude toward them. The Soviet Union is ready to cooperate not only on a multilateral basis, as in the U.N. Committee, but also on a bilateral basis, when such cooperation is based on mutually advantageous conditions. As is known the Soviet Union has already more than once made proposals on cooperation on the outer space problems. I have been also instructed to inform you that satisfaction is being expressed in the Soviet Union that XIV session of the U.N. General Assembly, which ended not long ago, decided to establish a United Nations Committee on Peaceful Uses of Outer Space. It goes without saying that the Soviet Union will take an active part in the work of the Committee.

Sincerely,

M. N. SMIRNOVSKY,
Chargé d'Affaires a.i. of the U.S.S.R. in the U.S.A.

SENATE

MONDAY, JANUARY 11, 1960

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, God, enable, we pray, with the light of Thy wisdom and the strength of Thy might, those who in these fear-haunted times are here entrusted with the stewardship of the Nation's life.

In our debates we face the things that divide this troubled world and set people against people, as their selfish interests clash. In prayer that is true and searching, we face Thee and ourselves, in Thy light.

Give us to see that the pride of nations, their greed, their lust of power, their aggressiveness against the lives of others, their deceitfulness and hypocrisy, are the very evils that corrode our own souls. And so we pray for ourselves, create in us clean hearts, O God.

Breathe on us, breath of God,
Fill us with life anew,
That we may love what Thou dost love,
And do what Thou wouldst do.

Amen.

AIR CARGO TRANSPORTATION

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to create an emergency airlift through a system of Government-insured loans. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may lie at the desk for 2 days for possible additional sponsorship.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. YOUNG of Ohio in the chair). The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and without objection the bill will lie at the desk for 2 days, as requested by the Senator from Oklahoma.

The bill (S. 2774) to foster the national defense, the postal service, the development of civil aeronautics, air commerce in the United States and abroad, and for other purposes, by providing for Government guarantee of loans to certain air carriers for purchase of efficient, newly developed, modern cargo aircraft and components of a cargo airlift system, introduced by Mr. MONRONEY, was received, read twice, by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, during the closing days of the last session of Congress I discussed at some length the problems of modern military air transportation and the proper role of the Military Air Transport Service and the civil air carriers in providing the airlift necessary to an adequate national defense.

I suggested at that time that MATS could not maintain the immediate readiness required by its wartime mission if it continued to perform all routine military logistics in its own aircraft, nor without modernization of its fleet. I pointed out at that time that neither MATS nor the commercial carriers have modern cargo aircraft capable of intercontinental movement of significant quantities of fully equipped troops and military equipment. Since these remarks were made, we have had confirmation of this analysis from others with far more knowledge and experience than I in military affairs.

I suggested last year that the solution to these problems was apparent and attainable:

First, an orderly transfer of the routine logistics function from the MATS fleet to the civil carriers, to the extent of their present capacity to perform it; second, a comprehensive program to develop and encourage the civil carriers to procure modern cargo aircraft to provide the capacity required to perform the air logistics function in time of peace and permit its expansion in time of emergency; third, modernization of the MATS strategic transport fleet in terms of its primary hard core mission, and not in terms of its former airline mission.

It is my hope that before this session of Congress is concluded the reorientation of MATS toward a more effective military role will be well advanced. It is also my hope that during this session the Congress will receive from the Department of Defense recommendations for a comprehensive modernization and reequipment of the MATS strategic transport fleet. But these are fields in which the Congress can do little but propose and in which ultimately the executive branch must dispose.

It is in terms of the second step in this three-point program that the Congress can take the most significant and the most immediate action. We can enact legislation to develop and to encourage the civil carriers to procure modern cargo aircraft to provide the logistic capacity required by our Military Establishment in peace and the reserve airlift required in war.

I introduce for appropriate reference a bill designed to do just this. It proposes that the Civil Aeronautics Board be authorized to guarantee the repayment of loans for the purchase of cargo aircraft by the Nation's commercial airlines.

This approach to adequate airlift is offered as the result of almost 3 years of study by the members of the Aviation Subcommittee and the Special Subcommittee To Investigate the Military Air Transport Service of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The details of the proposal are equally the result of consultations within the executive branch over a period of some 10 months. I commend it to my colleagues as an indispensable step in the development of a truly modern military establishment in the United States. I ask that the text of the bill be printed in full at this point in my remarks for the information of the Congress.

There being no objection, the text of the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress, in order to insure an adequate air cargo capacity to meet the needs of national defense, the postal service, the development of civil aeronautics, and to promote the development of air commerce in the United States and abroad: (1) to encourage the development by United States aircraft manufacturers of new, efficient and modern cargo aircraft which will provide economical air cargo transportation; (2) to facilitate the acquisition of such aircraft by United States certificated air carriers; (3) to encourage the use of such cargo aircraft operated by such carriers for the movement of commercial and Government cargo, and mail; and (4) to insure the immediate availability of such aircraft to meet military requirements in time of war, national emergency, or whenever a military situation requires. In furtherance of this policy, it is in the public interest that provision be made to assist such air carriers to acquire sufficient numbers of such cargo aircraft by providing guarantees of loans, for purchase thereof, on such terms as to insure their military availability.

SEC. 2. As used in this Act—

(a) "Administrator" means the Administrator of the Federal Aviation Agency.

(b) "Air carrier" means an air carrier as defined in section 101 of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958.

(c) "Board" means the Civil Aeronautics Board.

(d) "Cargo aircraft" means a newly developed modern civil aircraft of the United States, including spare engines and parts, and other specialized components of a cargo airlift system directly associated with flight line cargo handling, designed exclusively for the carriage of property or mail, or emergency carriage of combat forces or materiel.

(e) "Cargo aircraft purchase loan" means any loan, or commitment in connection therewith, made to a United States certificated air carrier for financing the purchase of United States-manufactured cargo aircraft, and shall include loans to certificated air carriers or any other person engaged in flight line cargo handling, for financing the purchase of specialized components of a cargo airlift system.

(f) "Certificated air carrier" means an air carrier holding a currently effective certificate issued by the Civil Aeronautics Board authorizing it to engage in air transportation.

SEC. 3. For a five-year period after the date of the enactment of this Act, the Board is hereby authorized to enter into an agreement with any lender guaranteeing him against loss of principal or interest on any cargo aircraft purchase loan made by such lender subject to the following conditions:

(a) The Board shall require that such cargo aircraft be adequately insured against loss or damage for the duration of the guaranty, and shall require that the applicant execute or agree to execute a suitable instrument or instruments to secure the cargo aircraft purchase loan. The Board may consent to the modification of the provisions of any such cargo aircraft purchase loan as to the rate of interest, time of payment of interest or principal, security, or other terms and conditions, or to the renewal or extension of any such guaranty, whenever the Board shall determine it to be equitable to do so: Provided, That such modification, renewal, or extension is not inconsistent with the provisions of this Act.

(b) No guaranty shall be made:

(1) Extending to more than the unpaid interest and 90 per centum of the unpaid principal of any cargo aircraft purchase loan;

(2) On any cargo aircraft purchase loan or combination of such loans for more than 75 per centum of the purchase price of the cargo aircraft;

(3) On any cargo aircraft purchase loan whose terms, modification, renewal, or extension thereof does not require repayment, in substantially equal principal payments no less than annually, to be completed within ten years after the date on which the loan is first made;

(4) In any case where it would make the total face amount of such cargo aircraft purchase loan, together with any other such loan or loans to the same air carrier, or corporate predecesor air carrier or air carriers, then currently guaranteed and outstanding under the terms of this Act, exceed $75,000,000: Provided, however, That no more than $10,000,000 in total face amount of any cargo aircraft purchase loan or loans shall be guaranteed for any one air carrier, or other eligible persons, for the purchase of specialized components of a cargo airlift system;

(5) Unless the Administrator shall have certified that the characteristics of the cargo aircraft as defined in this Act to be purchased with the proceeds of the guaranteed loan conform to the general design and performance criteria established by him, and that the guaranty will further the objectives of this Act;

(6) Unless the Secretary of Defense shall have certified that the cargo aircraft to be purchased with the proceeds of the guaranteed loan has design and performance characteristics which satisfy the criteria of suitability for military use established by him;

(7) Unless the Secretary of Defense shall have certified to the Board that the borrower has executed a contractual undertaking to the Department of Defense that the cargo aircraft in respect of which the guaranty is made (i) will, in the event of war, a national emergency, or whenever a military situation requires as determined by the Secretary of Defense, be made immediately available to the Department of Defense during the period of this guaranty, on reasonable terms including pricing criteria and arrangements for operation of the cargo aircraft agreed to prior to the making of the guaranty, and (ii) will not during the period of this guaranty be disposed of, except to a United States certificated air carrier: Provided, however, That the borrower, with the consent of the Secretary of Defense, may, for the purpose of fulfilling the foregoing undertakings substitute for any cargo aircraft on which a cargo aircraft purchase loan has been made hereunder a newer, more efficient, and modern cargo aircraft eligible for a cargo aircraft purchase loan and guaranty pursuant to this Act;

(8) Unless the Board shall have received a contractual undertaking satisfactory to it that the cargo aircraft be purchased with the proceeds of the guaranteed loan will be used primarily during the period of the guaranteed loan for the carriage of property or mail;

(9) Unless the Board shall have found (i) that, without such guaranty, the air carrier or other eligible person would be unable to obtain necessary funds for the purchase of such cargo aircraft on terms which are reasonable and compatible with efficent and profitable operation, (ii) that the prospective earning power of the air carrier or other eligible person furnishes reasonable assurance of the air carrier's ability to repay the loan within the time fixed therefor, (iii) that the value of the cargo aircraft covered by the guaranty will reasonably protect the interests of the Government in the event of default, and (iv) that the type and number of cargo aircraft proposed to be purchased by the air carrier will improve the economy and efficiency of the carrier's operation.

(c) Such guarantee shall be made in such form, on such terms and conditions, and pursuant to such regulations, as the Board deems necessary and which are not inconsistent with the provisions of this Act.

SEC. 4. Any guarantee made pursuant to this Act shall provide that the sole recourse of the United States, as assignee of a defaulted loan, against the defaulting borrower shall be limited to repossession of the cargo aircraft and the receipt by assignment of insurance claims, and that the obligation of the borrower to the United States shall be satisfied and discharged by the surrender of the cargo aircraft and all right, title, and interest therein to the United States: Provided, That such cargo aircraft shall be (i) free and clear of all liens and encumbrances whatsoever (other than the lien of any instrument executed to secure the cargo aircraft purchase loan) and (ii) in as good order and condition, ordinary wear and tear excepted, as when acquired, except that any deficiencies may, to the extent covered by valid policies of insurance, be satisfied by the assignment to the United States of claims under such policies. Where the conditions of the foregoing proviso have not been met, the United States shall retain all of its rights and remedies.

SEC. 5. No payments required to be made as a consequence of any guarantee by the Board under this Act shall be made unless the lender has assigned all his right, title, and interest to the cargo aircraft to the United States.

SEC. 6. The Board shall prescribe and collect from the lending institution a reasonable guaranty fee in connection with each loan guaranteed under this Act.

SEC. 7. (a) To permit the Administrator, the Board, and the Department of Defense to make use of such advice and services as each may require in carrying out the provisions of this Act, each is authorized to use available services and facilities of other agencies and instrumentalities of the Federal Government with their consent and on a reimbursable basis.

(b) Departments and agencies of the Federal Government shall exercise their powers, duties, and functions in such manner as will assist in carrying out the objectives of this Act, including an immediate and orderly transfer of increasing quantities of routine Government sponsored air cargo traffic to the certificated air carriers.

SEC. 8. (a) Receipts under this Act shall be credited to miscellaneous receipts of the Treasury.

(b) Payments required to be made as a consequence of any guaranty by the Board under this Act shall be made by the Board from funds hereby authorized to be appropriated in such amounts as may be necessary for that purpose.

(c) Administrative expenses under this Act shall be paid from appropriations to the departments and agencies concerned by administrative expenses.

SEC. 9. Any sale or other transfer of any cargo aircraft, on which a guaranty loan is outstanding, shall be subject to the provisions of this Act, any regulation issued hereunder, or any undertaking required to be entered into pursuant to this Act.

SEC. 10. The provisions of this Act shall become effective upon its enactment.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, briefly, the bill would authorize the Civil Aeronautics Board to guarantee the repayment of loans for the purchase only of approved modern cargo aircraft. The loan could not exceed 75 percent of the purchase price of the aircraft and would have to be repaid within 10 years. Ninety percent of the unpaid balance would be guaranteed, and repossession of the aircraft would be the sole recourse of the Government in the event of default. Loans to any one carrier could not exceed $75 million.

Because the purpose of this proposal is not simply to permit civil carriers to acquire more aircraft, but to facilitate their acquiring a particular type of aircraft which meets military requirements, the bill provides that before the CAB can guarantee a loan the Secretary of Defense must certify that the cargo aircraft to be purchased with the proceeds of the loan is one which has design and performance characteristics which make it suitable for military use in an emergency. On the other hand, in order to insure that the aircraft is also suitable for commercial use, the bill requires a similar certificate from the Administrator of the Federal Aviation Agency.

I am happy to report to the Senate that discussions between the military and civilian aviation agencies of the government looking toward a set of mutually acceptable design characteristics are already well advanced. I am also happy to report that it is the consensus among those most competent in this field that the development of a workhorse aircraft meeting both the needs of commercial and military aviation is now perfectly feasible.

Not only would this bill insure that the aircraft to be purchased from the proceeds of a guaranteed loan is suitable, but it would insure the availability of the aircraft to the Department of Defense in the event of a military emergency. On this score the bill is clear and unequivocal. It requires that the Secretary of Defense certify to the CAB that he has in his possession an executed contract with the borrower guaranteeing first, that the aircraft will be made immediately available to the Department of Defense in the event of war, or national emergency, or whenever a military situation is determined by the Secretary of Defense to require it; and second, that during the period of the guarantee the aircraft will not be disposed of by the borrower except to another U.S. certificated air carrier.

The responsibility for guaranteeing the loan and satisfying itself of the carrier's ability to repay it within the time fixed, and of insuring that the Government will be adequately protected by the value of the aircraft in the event of default, lies with the Civil Aeronautics Board. These and other detailed provisions of the bill will, of course, be the subject of thorough hearings, and Senators will have an adequate opportunity to study the details of the proposal.

I respectfully suggest to the Senate that the time has come to deal in the realities of today's military situation. I suggest that it is inexcusable that the greatest and richest Nation in the world let itself continue in a defense posture which makes it incapable of responding to anything but all-out thermonuclear war.

I respectfully suggest to the Senate that the indispensable element in preparedness for limited war situations is mobility and that in the decade of the sixties, military mobility means military airlift.

I am convinced that a substantial part of such airlift must be provided in a strategic fleet of military aircraft. I am equally convinced that a substantial part must be provided by a strategic reserve fleet of aircraft bought and used in peacetime by commercial carriers, but whose usefulness and availability to the Military Establishment in time of emergency is assured.

I believe that this bill is the means to achieve that reserve fleet. I believe that there is no greater contribution toward an adequate defense which can be taken at this session of Congress than the passage of this legislation.

PROPOSED LEGISLATION TO ADD WORLD PEACE TO THE INTERNATIONAL MISSION OF THE AMERICAN RED CROSS

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, considering the degree and the dangers of a thermonuclear world disaster threatening the very annihilation of the human race, man must strive relentlessly in his quest for peace. No stone should be left unturned, nor should any idea which may help the cause for peace go unexamined. This fact is more apparent today than ever before. For when we look back to 1945 when the atomic bomb was used on Hiroshima, we can remember that this 20-kiloton bomb, the equivalent of 20,000 tons of TNT, caused 150,000 casualties in an area of 5 square miles. It is important to remember, however, that today, this weapon is small as compared to the largest weapons in our present stockpile. Furthermore, the dread radiation resulting from these large bombs, should ever a thermonuclear war break out, would cause irreparable disaster not only to the many thousands of people in the immediate vicinity of the explosion, but perhaps would cripple and maim future generations. In such a war, no true victor could emerge. As a result, all our strategy and efforts should be directed toward the prevention of such a war.

Now as never before, our threatened world must have peace, and now as never before, men of good will everywhere must rise to the challenge of possible annihilation and contribute their talents, the world over, for a just and lasting peace.

Mr. President, it is with this thought in mind that I am pleased to introduce a worthy bill which was introduced earlier by my distinguished colleague in the House of Representatives, Representative WILLIAM H. MEYER, of Vermont. Representative MEYER's bill, H.R. 9027, introduced September 2, 1959, would amend the charter of the American National Red Cross so as to authorize the organization "to devise and carry on measures for the prevention of war and for the establishment of a just and lasting peace."

Section 8 of the American Red Cross charter reserves to Congress the right to amend or repeal the purposes of the organization as outlined in section 3 of the charter. This bill would provide a new clause to be added at the end of section 3, which would read as follows:

Sixth. And to devise and carry on measures for the prevention of war and for the establishment of a just and lasting peace.

RED CROSS COULD HELP PROMOTE PEACE

Mr. President, the first three purposes of the American National Red Cross relate solely to activities in time of war, mainly to furnishing aid to the sick and wounded. The fourth purpose permits voluntary relief and communication between the people and the Armed Forces in time of peace as well as in time of war. Only the fifth clause of section 3 of the charter refers to nonmilitary matters, and it refers to nonmilitary matters only. It permits peacetime relief of "the sufferings caused by pestilence, famine, fire, floods, and other great national calamities." This clause does permit preventive work for the calamities mentioned, but it does not include any reference to war or military matters. And since the other four clauses, which refer to war and military matters, do not contain any preventive measures, the bill I am introducing is needed to permit the Red Cross to engage in measures designed to prevent war and promote peace.

Naturally, the Red Cross may be reluctant to engage in the activities permitted by this proposed legislation, but it is important to note that this bill permits—but does not direct—the officials of the Red Cross to take on this additional responsibility. Whereas the original Red Cross was essentially a remedial agency, it has continually broadened its functions, until it has reached today a point where it has never had a greater prestige. It has now become a very important educational, health-protecting organization, as well as giving substantial assistance to individuals with misfortunes of many kinds. It administers first-aid and water-safety programs, and it has home nursing courses, blood banks, rural health centers, youth organizations, and generally does a great many things which otherwise would be left undone.

Although the President of the United States is ex officio the head of the American Red Cross, and although the Red Cross cooperates closely with the Government, it is independent of the Government. The Red Cross has never been involved in politics, for humanity knows no favorites. In delicate international situations, the Red Cross has performed valuable services, and through its continued nonpolitical nature, it has continuously promoted better understanding among peoples and thereby promoted an attitude of peace.

RED CROSS HIGHLY INFLUENTIAL

Mr. President, the International Red Cross is the most influential humanitarian lay organization in the world today. It has 125 million individual members, and as good loyal citizens of the 80 or more member countries, this ever-growing membership has been playing a vital part within the political, educational, religious, and other social organizations of their own countries.

The enactment of this bill would have a powerful effect throughout the world. The fact is that the American Red Cross, acting without political involvements, could do much toward the establishment of a just and lasting peace. The amendment to the charter would be an example of the peaceful aspirations of the American people, and it might well stimulate positive action by other countries in this same direction.

Mr. President, in the past the Red Cross has been in the background ready to act in case of a war. Today, however, the Red Cross cannot prepare for any next world war, as it prepared for World War I and II, for a single 20-megation hydrogen bomb carries more explosive power than all the bombs put together that were dropped during the entire Second World War. Since it would be impossible for the Red Cross to adequately prepare for a nuclear war, it can only prepare for a genuine world peace.

This proposal which I am cosponsoring with Representative MEYER is not a new proposal. In 1955, some 87 members of the Harvard Class of 1900, headed by Conrad Hobbs, retired Boston merchant, sent an open letter to President Dwight D. Eisenhower advocating the creation of a commission similar to the Red Cross for the study and promotion of world peace. This open letter suggested that the President appoint a commission of perhaps 20 men and women, from the industrial and financial leaders of the United States, from the clergymen, scientists, lawyers, farmers, labor leaders, educators, statesmen, philanthropists, historians, publicists, and others preeminent in their fields, who would make an exhaustive study in quest of a durable peace.

MRS. ELEANOR ROOSEVELT SUPPORTS PROPOSAL

This open letter was followed in 1958 by a petition signed by more than 150 outstanding Americans, asking President Eisenhower to recommend a charter amendment authorizing the American National Red Cross to work for the prevention of war and for the promotion of peace. Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, who has become synonymous in our time with humanitarian and good deeds, is among the many prominent signers of this petition. Among the other distinguished signers are Dr. Gunnar Gundersen, past president of the American Medical Association; Sarah G. Blanding, president of Vassar College; H. J. Gezork, president of Andover-Newton Theological School; Rev. Dana McGreeley, president of the American Unitarian Association; Samuel B. Gould, president of Antioch College; Robert J. Johnson, president of Temple University; William E. Stevenson, president of Oberlin College; Wesley A. Sturgis, dean of the Yale Law School; Miller Upton, president of Beloit College; Ralph Lowell, president of the Lowell Institute of Boston; and Dr. Robert H. Ellis noted retired physician of Portland Oreg.

The petition points out that "it has become obvious that bolder steps than ever before must be taken if this universal longing for peace is to be realized." It then argues that the Red Cross has unique qualifications in this field and that with its membership of millions on both sides of the iron curtain its prestige everywhere and its dedicated leadership and unequaled record in the relief of human suffering it is the ideal organization for creating an atmosphere favorable to the establishment of peace throughout the world.

NEED IS NOW IMMEDIATE

Mr. President, now as never before men of good will everywhere must rise to the challenge of possible annihilation and contribute their talents for a durable peace. This proposal I am introducing today would amend the American National Red Cross charter so as to authorize this great humanitarian organization to engage in activities for the prevention of war and for the establishment of a just and lasting peace. This responsibility, if taken on by the Red Cross, would admittedly be a huge task. But, it is consistent with the lofty purposes of this organization which in 1959 celebrated, throughout the world, its 100th birthday, and it would be a natural extension of the humanitarian causes already served by the agency. Although the final measures for the establishment of a durable peace must come from the governments of the world, the preliminary work, and the establishment of conditions favorable for peace must come from the people themselves. As the petition to the President of the United States of America concludes:

A long, long step forward could be taken under the leadership of the Red Cross.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill which I have just introduced be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 2775) to promote just and lasting peace by amending section 3 of the act of January 5, 1905, incorporating the American National Red Cross, so as to include among the purposes of such incorporation the prevention of war and the establishment of a just and lasting peace, introduced by Mr. NEUBERGER, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 3 of the Act entitled "An Act to incorporate the American National Red Cross", approved January 5, 1905 (36 U.S.C., sec. 3) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"Sixth. And to devise and carry on measures for the prevention of war and for the establishment of a just and lasting peace."

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks the open letter to the President of the United States by members of the Harvard class of 1900, the petition to the President of the United States in 1958 to which I have just referred, together with an editorial from the Boston Herald of September 17, 1959, entitled "New Task," supporting enlargement of the Red Cross charter.

There being no objection, the letter, petition, and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AN OPEN LETTER TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: In the spirit of your repeated declaration that no stone should be left unturned in the quest for a durable peace, we wish respectfully to suggest that you appoint a commission of perhaps twenty men and women, preeminent in their fields, to make an exhaustive study of this vast and complex problem.

The problem, as we see it, encompasses far more than lies within the field of the Government, which is concerned, primary, with its military, diplomatic and political aspects. It reaches in to the fields of religion, racial prejudice, nationalism, economics, mass psychology and many other fields.

We all know that heretofore the search has been fruitless; that wars have persisted with cumulative and aggravated horrors. But we cannot admit that the futility of past attempts foreshadows failure for fresh efforts. We cannot concede that man is biologically and inherently a destructive, suicidal creature. The certainty that another major war would inflict on all mankind, on victors as well as vanquished, on civilians as well as combatants, on children and women, the most cruel calamity in history, impels us to plead for sympathetic consideration of this new approach.

We recommend that you muster the proposed commission from both the business world and the professions—industrial and financial leaders, clergymen, scientists, lawyers, farmers, labor leaders, educators, statesmen, philanthropists, historians, publicists, and others. We believe that the coordinated, matured judgments of the clearest minds might provide a program for the country at large, a program that would supplement and fortify the comprehensive efforts which the Government is making. Under your inspiring leadership, Mr. President, far more could be done in every community in the land—by study groups, debates, lectures, forums and the like; far more in schools and colleges; far more by the radio and TV and the press. Millions could be spent with profit on such endeavors.

We recommend that this Commission be asked to give serious consideration to the establishment of an agency, somewhat similar in structure to the American National Red Cross, which is a nongovernmental body yet closely associated with the Government. The Red Cross has its charter from the Congress of the United States; its Honorary President is the President of the United States; eight of its Board of Directors are appointed by the President. But, at the same time, in its operations it is autonomous; it raises its funds from the people (in its fiscal year 1953–54 well over $85 million) and it carries on its multifarious activities largely by the work of its volunteers, in its 7,700 branches and chapters throughout the country. Furthermore, it has taken a leading part in the creation of similar institutions in 70 other countries, joined together in the League of Red Cross Societies.

Such steps would give further evidence to the world that our vast military machine must be maintained, only because we live in a world of international discord and anarchy, from which we have, so far, been unable to escape. Such an undertaking, we submit, might have many far-reaching benefits:

It might stimulate to positive action many segments of our people who today, without leadership, participate only passively in the search for peace.

It might stimulate other countries to take similar action, as has the Red Cross.

It might lead the way for a spiritual and moral resurgence throughout the country and perhaps the world.

It might, in fact, prove the catalyst which would bring all these and many other forces together in such an overwhelming demand for peace that no government would dare ignore their mandate.

To be sure, many individuals and organizations are hard at work on this problem, but no one, to our knowledge, has proposed a definite, feasible plan so far reaching and so likely to gain the cooperation and support of our countrymen.

Nearly a hundred years ago, an obscure Swiss businessman crossed the bloody battlefield of Solferino the day after the battle and, viewing the abandoned wounded, dying, and dead, vowed that such inhumanity must no longer be endured. From that day forth, Henri Dunant, renouncing all else, began sowing the seed which became the great farflung humanitarian organization the Red Cross is today. Does not our proposal present to you, Mr. President, a similar opportunity for a great organized movement of our people, leading, under God, to a lasting peace?

Respectfully,

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: We, the undersigned, respectfully petition that, as honorary president of the American National Red Cross, you recommend to Congress an amendment of its charter, whereby it will be authorized to engage in activities for the prevention of war. The amended portion (sec. 3, par. 5) would then read as follows:

"And to continue and carry on a system of national and international relief in time of peace and apply the same in mitigating the sufferings caused by pestilence, famine, fire, floods, and other great national calamities, and to devise and carry on measures for preventing the same, as well as measures for the prevention of war."

We submit this petition to you in the spirit of your inspiring address to the Peoples-to-Peoples Conference, in which you said: "The problem of permanent peace is for the people to get together; to lead governments; if necessary, to evade governments; to work out not one method but thousands" in the endeavor to establish peace throughout the world.

It has become obvious that bolder steps than ever before must be taken if this universal longing for peace is to be realized. The Red Cross has unique qualifications in this field, qualifications far superior to those of most governments and private organizations.

The Red Cross has a membership of millions on both sides of the Iron Curtain, in its 75 national societies. Its prestige is high everywhere. Under dedicated leadership its members could form the nucleus of a mighty army of workers for peace. Its unequaled record in the relief of human suffering indicates clearly what it might accomplish in this new field.

It is no disparagement of other agencies to assert that they lack the organization and the facilities possessed by the Red Cross to stimulate to action millions of people who have been passive heretofore. As a war-preventive agency, the Red Cross would rivet the attention of mankind. An undertaking of this kind would be typical of the ever-widening scope of the Red Cross since it was established over a century ago to relieve the sufferings of soldiers lying wounded and uncared for on the battlefield of Solferino.

We do not venture to submit a bill of particulars for the Red Cross in this new and by far most important service it could render to mankind. That must be left to the directors of the Red Cross and to the committees which they would set up; and as you have pointed out, Mr. President, there are a thousand methods which could be employed, and the Red Cross is particularly well equipped to put many of these into operation. If the minds of millions of people could be directed to the problem of establishing peace throughout the world, is it not reasonable to expect that some far-spreading, deep-reaching programs, not yet developed and not foreseeable, might emerge, to the blessing of all mankind?

As it is not from huge armaments that freedom from war and from the fear of war will come, so it is that any expenditure of money, however large, is not only justified but necessary. Billions are spent annually for defense and, in present circumstances, these must continue. But can we not also afford to expend millions in an attempt to remove the conditions which make these heavy outlays unavoidable? We should not falter at spending vast sums in an attempt to arouse throughout the world a public opinion so strong that no government will dare to ignore the mandate.

The final formal measures for the prevention of war must come from governments, of course. The preliminary work, however, the establishment of an atmosphere for peace must come, as you have said, Mr. President, from the people themselves. A long, long step forward could be taken under the leadership of the Red Cross.

Respectfully,

NEW TASK

Is peace attainable?

Intellectually, most of us say "No." But in our hearts we answer differently. For us and ours, we say, it must be attainable. There must be a way.

A few people—too few—try to reconcile these points of view. They keep looking for some intellectually satisfactory expression of the universal peace urge. They haven't found it yet, but they deserve our support. They are at least headed where we all want to go.

Representative WILLIAM H. MEYER, of Vermont, has just introduced a bill in Congress to amend the charter of the American National Red Cross authorizing the organization "to devise and carry on measures for the prevention of war and for the establishment of a just and lasting peace."

It doesn't sound like a very imposing step. And the Red Cross itself isn't enthusiastic about it. But the legislation is permissive and it just might lead to something valuable. Locally, Mr. Conrad Hobbs and fellow members of the Harvard Class of 1900 have been advocating the same step on the ground that the Red Cross is the private international organization best equipped to take the assignment on.

Why not? What harm could come of it?

Dr. Jean S. Pictet recently observed: "The Red Cross is the only great idea in whose name men have never slain; it remains one of the few reasons for not losing hope; its work during many years offers the certainty and proof that love is stronger than death."

The task is a huge one, but it is consistent with the lofty purposes of the Red Cross. It is a natural extension of the humanitarian causes already served by the agency. Perhaps in this, its centennial year, it should assume a new responsibility.

The Meyer bill at least represents a forward step. Peace will certainly be no less attainable if it is passed. We join the call for an enlargement of the Red Cross charter.

RAYMOND THOMASON, JR.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to authorize Raymond Thomason and his wife, Pauline, to adopt a third Korean orphan. Oddly enough, under the law only two such orphans can be brought into the country by them. The third orphan has already been adopted, and is in an orphanage in Korea; and they wish to bring this orphan into the country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2776) for the relief of Raymond Thomason, Jr., introduced by Mr. DIRKSEN, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

GEORGE E. WILLIAMS AND WILLIAM L. JOHNSON

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill in the nature of a claim against the Department of Commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2777) for the relief of George E. Williams and William L. Johnson, introduced by Mr. DIRKSEN, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

FREEDOM OF INFORMATION

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, for some time the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights has been considering freedom-of-information legislation in connection with its study of the extent to which constitutional rights are being infringed by undue secrecy in government.

In the 85th Congress the subcommittee considered two freedom-of-information bills which I introduced: Senate bill 921, the language of which became Public Law 85–619; and Senate bill 2148. The subcommittee received and published the views of executive departments and agencies on S. 2148, but because of the press of other business was unable finally to consider and report the legislation before the Congress expired.

In the present 86th Congress, I introduced Senate bill 186, a bill identical to Senate bill 2148. Although this bill was referred to the newly established Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Administrative Practice and Procedure, the Constitutional Rights Subcommittee continued its work on this proposed legislation with the agreement of the chairman of the other subcommittee, who is also a member of this subcommittee, and during the first session of the 86th Congress held hearings on the proposal.

A majority of the Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights has voted to report a clean bill which follows the lines of the proposed legislation above, referred to, with strengthening and clarifying amendments shown to be desirable by the subcommittee's study and hearings.

I now introduce this clean bill for the subcommittee, and ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 2780) to amend section 3 of the act of June 11, 1946 (60 Stat. 238) to clarify and protect the right of the public to information, introduced by Mr. HENNINGS, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 3 of the Act of June 11, 1946 (60 Stat. 238) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. In order to provide adequate and effective information for the public—

"(a) ORGANIZATION RULES AND FORMS.—Every agency shall separately state and promptly file for publication in the Federal Register and for codification in the Code of Federal Regulations: (1) Descriptions of its central and field organization, including statements of the general course and method by which its functions are channeled and determined, delegations by the agency of final authority, and the established places at which, and the methods whereby, the public may obtain information or make submittals or requests; (2) all procedural rules; (3) all other rules; (4) descriptions of all forms available for public use and instructions relating thereto, including a statement of where and how such forms and instructions may be otbained; and (5) every amendment, revision, and revocation of the foregoing.

"(b) ALTERNATIVE METHODS.—An agency may, pursuant to a published rule, use an alternative method of publishing the information specified in subsection (a) or of communicating it to all interested persons, when to do so will achieve economy and expedite dissemination of information to the public. No information published by such alternative method shall be relied upon or cited against any person who has not received prior, reasonable, and actual notice thereof.

"(c) ORDERS AND OPINIONS.—Every agency shall promptly publish its orders and opinions or make them available to the public in accordance with published rule stating where and how they may be obtained, examined, or copied.

"(d) PUBLIC RECORDS.—Every agency shall promptly make available to the public, in accordance with a published rule stating where and how they may be obtained, examined, or copied, all records, files, papers and documents submitted to and received by the agency, including but not limited to applications, petitions, pleadings, requests, claims, communications, reports or other papers, and all records and actions by the agency thereon, except as the agency by published rule finds that withholding is permitted by subsection (f) hereof. Every individual vote and official act of an agency shall be entered of record and made available to the public.

"(e) EFFECT OF FAILURE TO PUBLISH.—No rule, order, opinion or public record, shall be relied upon or cited by any agency against any person unless it has been duly published or made available to the public in accordance with this section. No person shall in any manner be bound by or required to resort to any organization or procedure not so published.

"(f) EXCEPTIONS.—The provisions of this section shall not require disclosure of subject matter which is (1) specifically exempt from disclosure by statute, (2) required to be kept secret in the protection of the national security, (3) submitted in confidence pursuant to statute or published rule, or (4) of such a nature that disclosure would be a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy; however, nothing in this section authorizes withholding of information or limiting availability of records to the public except as specifically stated in this subsection."

PROPOSED CIVIL RIGHTS LEGISLATION

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I have five bills to introduce on the subject of civil rights. As I understand the rule, I am allowed 3 minutes on each bill. If the Chair will indulge me, I shall try to wrap them up together in less than 10 minutes.

I am today introducing, for appropriate reference, a group of five civil rights bills, including three measures to further protect and secure voting rights for all citizens, regardless of race, creed, color, or national origin. The bills are keyed to the major recommendation of the President's Civil Rights Commission that a system of Federal voting registrars be established in areas where there is valid proof of denial of the right to vote for discriminatory reasons. Another bill would make lynching a Federal crime where it deprives an individual of his right to a fair trial, subjecting violators to a fine, imprisonment, or both. The remaining proposal introduced today would permit the U.S. Attorney General to take part in those civil cases where an individual charges that he is being deprived of one of his constitutional rights.

I am introducing these measures as bills, even though the ideas have previously been proposed by me as amendments to other bills. I think the time has come to give them bill status, and to provide for their reference to appropriate committees. I believe that the question of the committees to which the various bills are referred will have a considerable influence upon what happens to them.

In his state of the Union message, President Eisenhower commended to the Congress for action this session the civil rights legislation sent down by the administration almost 12 months ago and the recommendations of the Civil Rights Commission made last September. He called upon us to signal the world, by our action on this legislation, that "our Government is striving for equality under law for all our people."

To me, his words—particularly as they stressed the historic importance of every citizen being able to exercise his constitutional right to vote—hammered home the point that civil rights is the number one domestic issue of 1960 before this Congress.

In 1957 the Senate debated the Civil Rights Act directly when it came over from the House of Representatives. The test of the Senate rules made at that time demonstrated that this was an effective and expeditious procedure particularly adapted to the situation we face of long delayed committee action in the Senate on civil rights matters.

A drive is being made now in the House of Representatives to bring up the civil rights bill for consideration by the discharge petition route. I am urging all the members of my party in the House to favorably consider the advisability of signing this discharge petition, notwithstanding a normal and understandable reluctance to sign discharge petitions.

In the first place, I believe this reluctance to join in a discharge petition is far less applicable as a principle to the minority, though we all know that in this instance Speaker SAM RAYBURN has practically invited signing of this discharge petition by the majority. Also, it is clear that Republican signatures are essential in view of the large number of Members from the South on the Democratic side. Hence, the discharge petition may well prove to be the crucial test of whether a Member has sought effectively to get essential civil rights legislation enacted in the House of Representatives at this session .

If the past events of 1957 are prolog to the civil rights debate scheduled to start on the Senate floor no later than February 15, according to the assurances of the majority and minority leadership, there will be spirited debate on both sides. For, as we must all realize, the climactic fight is at hand and the Senate Chamber will be the critical battleground. Here it will be determined whether a meaningful civil rights legislation is to pass the Congress in 1960, or whether complacency, and campaign fever will prevail to postpone effective and desperately needed civil rights legislation.

While civil rights is our number one domestic issue, it is also supercharged with international implications affecting our world position. Premier Khrushchev would probably much prefer to sit down at the Summit Conference this coming May with President Eisenhower in an atmosphere in which the U.S. Congress had turned deaf ears on the report of the Federal Civil Rights Commission and the words of the President's message urging civil rights action. As leader of the Free World, the U.S. in the person of President Eisenhower will be the spokesman at the summit for a free world which is more than two-thirds nonwhite. It is of vital importance to us that these populations educate themselves to the priceless heritage of ruling themselves while making economic progress in freedom. If the voting conditions which exist today in at least 32 counties in 5 of our own States, according to the Civil Rights Commission, were to prevail in these predominantly nonwhite areas of the free world, then only about 5 percent out of a population of more than 1 billion people would be able to vote in their own national elections. The total vote in the countries of the non-Communist world whose total population is already six times that in the U.S. would not even add up to the number of U.S. voters in the 1952 or 1956 national campaigns. No society can hope to remain strong enough to sustain democratic institutions for very long when only 1 out of every 20 citizens does or can go to the polls to vote for candidates pledged to support them. Instead of allowing discriminatory practices to limit the size of our electorate, this is the beginning of a new decade when in the interest of our own national strength and survival, every citizen must have maximum opportunity to develop his talents, through education, to train for and work at the kind of job for which he is best suited by his skills, and to back the candidate of his choice at the polls, regardless of race, creed or color.

To quote the President again from his message last Thursday:

> The right to vote has been one of the strongest pillars of a free society * * * our first duty is to protect this right against all encroachment.

The same day those words were spoken by the President, the Chairman of the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration, Senator HENNINGS, announced that later this month or early in February, public hearings will be held on proposals which would authorize the President to appoint temporary officials to register qualified U.S. citizens to vote in Federal elections. I hope that when they are held, testimony will be heard pertinent to three voting measures I am introducing today, which were originally submitted late last session as amendments to other civil rights bills previously introduced.

One of these measures provides for the retention of voting records in Federal elections for at least a 5-year period as recommended by the Civil Rights Commission. It reported that the unavailability of such records seriously hampers efforts to investigate alleged denials of voting rights. A second bill in the voting rights series implements another of the Commission's recommendations that the Civil Rights Acts of 1957 should be amended to safeguard an individual's right to vote in cases where boards of registrars and other public officials attempt to deny voting rights by failing to fulfill their legal duties to meet at specified times for the purpose of registering voters and by other means without legal justification.

This is the much discussed proposal to have Federal voting registrars.

In that connection, there are two small straws in the wind, in the form of events which took place since the report of the Civil Rights Commission was issued. I do not elaborate upon them as being great points, but they are small straws in the wind.

Since the Civil Rights Commission recommended a system of Federal voting registrars in its report to the President and the Congress this September, new developments have taken place in Southern States which affect voting rights. One new law, the Commission reports, gives the local registrars in Alabama statutory authority to devote some of the time which was formerly allocated for the purpose of registering qualified voters for other time-consuming clerical duties. It could be used to facilitate the closing of registrars' offices in the face of Negroes who might wish to register. Also, the Civil Rights Commission reports that in Harris County, Tex., the county tax assessor-collector has started to use a long-standing practice of registrars in Louisiana—it requires those paying poll taxes to swear to their identity and place of residence, and upon challenge to produce witnesses whose qualifications are to be determined solely by the local registrars.

The third measure which I am introducing deals with the subject covered by part 3 of the 1957 bill. I think it meets a great many of the objections which have been made to part 3, and at the same time retains the essential proposition that where the individual is facing the machinery of an entire State, an entire county, or an entire community, and is being deprived of civil rights, he is entitled to have the majesty and authority of the United States asserted, in a case which has widespread implications of civil rights being denied to many people.

Since 1960 is a national election year, it is a paramount importance that every eligible citizen be encouraged to register and vote. We would stand an excellent chance of having a really high record vote this year if a bill such as the Federal Elections Voting Rights Act which I am introducing today is enacted during this session of Congress. It would be of major importance in those areas where a disproportionately small number of nonwhites have registered in the past. Henceforth when nine or more complainants about denial of voting rights in one locality during the same year are received and substantiated, the President would be authorized to appoint a local Federal official to act as a voting registrar for as long as discriminatory practices jeopardized individual voting rights in that locality.

The permissive intervention legislation I am also submitting today is designed to do away with one of the most serious weaknesses of the 1957 Civil Rights Act as it was finally approved by the Senate. By permitting the Attorney General to enter into civil cases brought by persons charging denial of equal protection of the law, individuals of the most modest circumstances will not be prevented from appealing directly to our Federal courts when they believe, for example, that they are being deprived of the right to vote, to ride on desegregated public transportation and, of course, to attend a desegregated public school.

The final bill to make lynching a Federal crime is one of several proposals put forward since the lynching of a Negro, Mack Charles Parker, in Poplarville, Miss., where he was in jail awaiting trial on a charge of criminal assault, at a time when we had a right to hope that no similar lynching would take place in any part of our country.

At present, a Federal grand jury has been called to review the case following the failure of a local jury to bring an indictment, to call a single witness or even review the extensive FBI report of its investigation into the lynching. The first report that a gang of masked men dragged Parker out of his cell and killed him was a severe shock to all of us, regardless of what section of the country we live in. Although lynchings in the United States have reportedly been few and far between in recent years, the need for a strong Federal antilynch law is more urgent than ever for one such tragedy of mob violence leaves the kind of open wound on our national conscience which can take years to heal. We cannot tolerate the angry scars with which discrimination on account of race, religion, color, or national origin can disfigure a society. The enactment of meaningful civil rights legislation at this session of Congress will enormously strengthen us in our determination to work together to win freedom at home and abroad.

Finally, it must not be underemphasized that what we do about civil rights in our country is critically important, in connection with what takes place in the rest of the world. We are going into a summit conference in May with Khrushchev. In that connection, we shall be the spokesmen at the summit for a free world which is more than two-thirds nonwhite. If voting took place in other countries where we are seeking self-determination of peoples as it does among many of the nonwhite populations of our Southern States, there would be less than 5 percent of the population of 1 billion people able to vote in their own national elections.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bills I am introducing today may be printed in the body of the RECORD following my statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bills will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bills will be printed in the RECORD.

The bills, introduced by Mr. JAVITS, were received, read twice by their titles, appropriately referred, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Committee on the Judiciary:

"S. 2782. A bill to amend the Civil Rights Act to further protect the right to vote in Federal elections.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, section 2004 of the Revised Statutes (42 U.S.C. 1971) as amended by section 301 of the Civil Rights Act of 1957 (71 Stat. 637) is further amended by inserting at the end of subsection (b) the following:

" 'Nor shall any person or group of persons, under color of State law, arbitrarily and without legal justification or cause, act, or being under duty to act, fail to act, in such manner as to deprive or threaten to deprive any individual or group of individuals of the opportunity to register, vote and have that vote counted for any candidate for the office of President, Vice President, presidential elector, Member of the Senate, or Member of the House of Representatives, Delegate or Commissioner for the territories or possessions, at any general, special or primary election held solely or in part for the purpose of selecting or electing any such candidate.' "

To the Committee on Rules and Administration:

"S. 2783. A bill to protect the right to vote in Federal elections against denial on account of race, religion, color, or national origin, by providing for the appointment of Federal registrars by the President.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, this Act may be cited as the 'Federal Elections Voting Rights Act'.

"SEC. 2. For the purposes of this Act—

"(a) The term 'Federal election' means any general or special election held solely or partially for the purpose of electing any individual to, or any primary election held solely or partially for the purpose of selecting any individual as a candidate or nominee for, any of the following Federal offices:

"(2) The office of elector for President or Vice President of the United States;

"(3) The office of Member of the United States Senate;

"(4) The office of Member of the House of Representatives of the United States; or

"(5) The office of Delegate or Commissioner of any territory or possession of the United States representing such territory or possession in the House of Representatives of the United States.

"(b) The term 'registration district' means a county, parish, district, or other political subdivision of a State which, under State law, is authorized to provide for the registration or qualification of voters, living within such county, parish, district, or other political subdivision.

"SEC. 3. Any individual who—

"(1) believes that he is qualified under the laws of the State in which he lives, to vote in Federal elections held in such States;

"(2) within one year before the date of filing a petition under this section, has been denied the right to register to vote, to vote, or to have his vote counted in such elections after having attempted to do so in the manner and at the time and place provided for by the laws of such State; and

"(3) believes that the sole reason he was denied such right was because of his race, religion, color, or national origin, may file a sworn statement with the President of the United States alleging that he has been denied the right to register to vote, to vote, or to have his vote counted in such elections solely because of his race, religion, color, or national origin, and petitioning the President to appoint a temporary Federal registrar for his registration district. Such sworn statement shall be filed in such form and manner as the President may by regulations prescribe and shall contain a detailed account of the facts upon which the allegations contained therein are based.

"(b) The Commission shall conduct an investigation with respect to any such petitions referred to it for the purposes of determining whether or not the allegations contained in such petitions are true. If the Commission, on the basis of its investigation of such allegations, determines that citizens of the United States living in the registration district of the petitioners are being deprived of the right to register to vote, to vote, or to have their vote counted in Federal elections solely because of their race, religion, color, or national origin, the Commission shall certify that fact to the President. The Commission shall also certify to the President and to any temporary Federal registrar who may be appointed for such district the names of any petitioner living in such district whom the Commission believes to be entitled, under the laws of the State in which such district is situated to vote in Federal elections held in such State.

"(c) Upon receipt of a certification from the Commission under subsection (b) with respect to any registration district, the President shall appoint, from among Federal officers or employees living in or near such district, an individual to serve as a temporary Federal registrar for such district. Any such Federal registrar shall serve until such time as the President determines that citizens living within the registration district for which such registrar was appointed are no longer being denied the right to register to vote, to vote, or to have their vote counted, in Federal elections solely because of their race, religion, color, or national origin.

"SEC. 5. The Federal registrar for any registration district shall accept vote registration applications from all individuals living within such district who allege that they are being denied the right to register to vote in such district solely because of their race, religion, color, or national origin. "SEC. 6. Any individual who is registered under this Act by a Federal registrar to vote in Federal elections shall have the right to cast his vote and have such vote counted in any Federal election, and any election official who willfully denies him such right shall be fined not more than $300 and imprisoned for not longer than six months, or both."

The Congress further finds that such interference or obstruction threatens the administration of justice of the several States and thereby imperils their republican form of government which, under the Constitution of the United States, it is the obligation of the United States to guarantee.

"'(b) Whenever two or more persons shall knowingly in concert for the purpose of depriving any person, either directly or indirectly, of his right to a fair trial or his right not to be deprived of life, liberty, or property except by due process of law, willfully interfere with or obstruct any process or proceeding of a State or Territory or political subdivision thereof, for the apprehension, confinement, trial, and punishment of any person charged with a crime or held for investigation or as a material witness through acts or threats of force, then anyone who knowingly instigates, incites, organizes, aids, abets, or participates in such action shall, upon conviction, be fined not more than $1,000, or imprisoned not more than 1 year, or both: Provided, however, That where such action results in death or maiming or other serious physical or mental injury, constituting a felony under applicable State, Territorial, or similar law, any such person shall, upon conviction, be fined not more than $10,000, or imprisoned not more than 20 years, or both.

he is subject to or threatened with loss of his rights under the Constitution of the United States to equal protection of the laws by reason of race, color, religion, or national origin, the court shall certify such fact to the Attorney General, and shall permit the United States to intervene for presentation of evidence, if evidence is otherwise admissible in the case, and for argument on the question of whether such person is subject to or threatened with loss of his right to equal protection of the laws and the relief to be granted. The United States shall, subject to the applicable provisions of law, have all the rights of a party and be subject to all liabilities of a party as to court costs to the extent necessary for proper presentation of the facts and law relating to the questions of whether such person is subject to or threatened with loss of his right to equal protection of the laws and the relief granted by the court'.

LIABILITY OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT IN CONNECTION WITH ACCIDENTS INCIDENT TO CERTAIN AIR DEFENSE ACTIVITIES

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, on behalf of my colleague, the junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING], and myself, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to assume the States' liability for activities of members of the National Guard engaged in air defense activities on a tactical site which is under the control of the Army or the Air Force, and for other purposes. I ask unanimous consent that the bill itself, together with an explanation thereof, be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the bill and explanation will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 2787) to assume the States' liability for activities of members of the National Guard engaged in air defense activities on a tactical site which is under the control of the Army or the Air Force and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. JAVITS (for himself and Mr. KEATING) was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Armed Services, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 2671 of title 28, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"As used in this chapter and sections 1346(b) and 2401(b) of this title, the term—

"'Federal agency' includes the executive departments and independent establishments of the United States and corporations primarily acting as instrumentalities or agencies of the United States, but does not include any contractor with the United States.

"'Employees of the government' includes officers or employees of any Federal agency; members of the military or naval forces of the United States and, while engaged in air defense activities on a tactical site that is under the control of the Army or the Air Force, members of the National Guard, as defined in section 101(2) of title 32; and persons acting on behalf of a Federal agency in an official capacity, temporarily or permanently in the service of the United States whether with or without compensation.

"'Acting within the scope of his office or employment', in the case of a member of the military or naval forces of the United States or, while engaged in air defense activities on a tactical site that is under the control of the Army or the Air Force, a member of the National Guard, as defined in section 101(2) of title 32, means acting in line of duty."

SEC. 2. Section 2733(f) of title 10, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"(f) For the purposes of this section—

(1) a member of the Coast and Geodetic Survey or of the Public Health Service who is serving with the Navy or the Marine Corps, or a member of the National Guard who is engaged in air defense activities on a tactical site that is under the control of the Army or the Air Force, shall be treated as if he were a member of the armed force concerned; and

(2) a person employed by the National Guard under section 709 of title 32 who is engaged in air defense activities on a tactical site that is under the control of the Army or the Air Force, shall be treated as if he were a civilian officer or employee of the military department concerned.

SEC. 3. Section 710 of title 32, United States Code, is amended by adding the following new subsection at the end thereof:

"(g) Notwithstanding subsections (b) and (c), each State and Territory, Puerto Rico, the Canal Zone, and the District of Columbia is relieved of accountability and pecuniary liability for military property issued by the United States to its National Guard for air defense activities on tactical sites that are under the control of the Army or the Air Force, except for loss or destruction of, or damage to, that property attributable to an officer, employee, or agent of that State or Territory, Puerto Rico, the Canal Zone, or the District of Columbia, whichever is concerned, who is not engaged in those activities."

The statement submitted by Mr. JAVITS is as follows:

MEMORANDUM

Amendment of Federal Tort Claims Act to extend liability of the Federal Government to cover accidents incident to air defense activities of the Army National Guard and Air National Guard, thus relieving the States of liability

The New York Army National Guard, and the National Guard of other States, has been requested by the Department of the Army to man missile bases on tactical sites. They will replace units of the Regular Army on such bases and they will be employed in the tactical defense of the United States against enemy air or missile attack.

The Department of the Army has presented to New York State a form of agreement for the manning of such missile sites. The form of the agreement is generally unobjectionable and the defense of the United States against enemy attack is a mission which the New York Army National Guard is qualified and glad to perform and is within the scope of its duties as the first line Reserve component of the U.S. Army. However, the manning of a missile base could give rise to an untold amount of liability in the event of the accidental explosion of a missile on such a site, such as happened in New Jersey several years ago.

In order to avoid the assumption of such liability, New York State has suggested that the appropriate Federal authorities include in the proposed contract a form of indemnity agreement whereby the Federal Government would indemnify and hold harmless the State of New York and its Army National Guard units and personnel with respect to any liability which may arise out of acts or incidents in connection with the manning of such a missile base. While the Federal Government admits in its contract that the Army National Guard units so employed will be an integral part of the U.S. Army, the Federal Government has refused to execute the indemnity agreement requested.

Since the defense of the United States against enemy attack is a Federal mission and the Army has accepted the Army National Guard as an integral part of the Armed Forces of the United States while so employed, it is felt that any liability resulting from an act or incident in connection with the operation of such a missile base may be ultimately determined to be a Federal responsibility. However, in the absence of a statute, such liability would probably be determined only after a long period of litigation. In order to avoid the necessity for litigation to determine financial responsibility for damages which may result from an accident or incident in connection with the operation of a missile base, legislation to amend the Federal Tort Claims Act is urgently necessary. A bill to accomplish this purpose is submitted herewith.

It will be noted that the provisions of the proposed bill include the potential liability of the State, not only with respect to the manning of missile bases by Army National Guard units, but also the employment of units of the Air National Guard in the tactical defense of the United States against enemy attack. Air National Guard units, for many years, have performed a Federal mission in that they have had jet planes constantly on a 24-hour alert to intercept any enemy air attack. Since these planes are armed with air-to-air rockets and missiles, the arguments set forth above with respect to the possible exposure of New York State to liability for the accidental explosion of a ground missile are equally applicable to the air-to-air mission of the Air National Guard.

THE MARIGOLD AS OUR NATIONAL FLORAL EMBLEM

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, the present occupant of the Chair, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. YOUNG] will be interested in at least the opening paragraph of my remarks.

I believe it is in Ashland, Ohio, that there is a marker to Johnny "Appleseed" Chapman. He was one of the dedicated persons who in the early days in the Middle West, gathered and scattered apple seeds. While others were foraging with guns and fighting with Indians, Johnny "Appleseed" Chapman went about with a canoeload of apple seed, if he could contrive it. He left a very rich heritage; and I suppose the genetic offspring of some of those apple trees are still extant in the great Buckeye State, together with the wholesome fruit they provide.

It seems to me that in every generation there are such people. They are unselfish and devoted, even as Johnny Appleseed was.

I consider David Burpee, of Philadelphia, a member of a long line of very distinguished seedsmen, as a person of that kind. Interestingly enough, he is a cousin of the late Luther Burbank. So, much of his life has been devoted to techniques which make the great complex of sun and soil and moisture produce more abundantly, and even improve upon nature, and, particularly, produce flowers of great beauty and perfection. In so doing a vast improvement on natural processes has been brought about.

For two generations, David Burpee has experimented with flowers, in the hope of producing one that is of American origin, and so hardy, so lovely, so easy to grow, so diffused, so long-blooming, that it might properly claim a place as the national floral emblem of this country.

At long last, he felt that the marigold, a flower first discovered by the explorer Cortez in Mexico, the seeds of which Cortez took back to the Old World, was the flower that should rightly become our national floral emblem.

I emphasize the term "our national floral emblem" because, of course, a floral emblem must be in the form of a flower. In the West they have been presenting the cause for the corn tassle as the national flower. I am not enough of a plant geneticist to know exactly whether it is a flower. The experts disagree about that.

In any event, this flower from the New World, which was taken to the Old World, and improved upon, was in those days used for church functions and was called Mary's gold. Subsequently it became the marigold.

I can say I have taken real delight in producing a few prize marigolds.

Over the years, David Burpee has worked tirelessly to improve the marigold and develop greater ranges of color, larger flowers, greater hardiness, and foliage with a more agreeable scent, so that it might with the least effort be produced in every part of the United States and be rightly considered as our national floral emblem.

I am not insensible to the fact that selection of a flower as our national floral emblem has been a matter of high controversy. The rose, the carnation, the corn tassel, the aster, and others have all been advanced for consideration.

I believe that an outstanding seedsman and florist who has devoted incalculable hours and untold sums of money to research in this field is fully entitled to have the product of a lifetime of effort properly considered.

To that end, I assured him, when he was in my office, that, by request, I would be glad to introduce a measure to designate the marigold as our national flower.

We have a national bird—the American eagle. We have a national emblem—the Stars and Stripes. Sometime Congress may wish to designate a national floral emblem; and by joint resolution, I formalize, for consideration, the marigold, at the request of a great seedsman and a great florist, David Burpee. I introduce the joint resolution for appropriate reference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 146) designating the American marigold (Tagetes erecta) as the national floral emblem of the United States, introduced by Mr. DIRKSEN (by request), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EXTENSION OF LIBRARY SERVICES ACT—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF BILL

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, last Thursday, January 7, the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] introduced Senate bill 2764 to extend the Library Services Act. I wish to announce my cosponsorship of that bill at this time, and to commend the distinguished Senator from Kentucky for his work on this proposal.

It is my understanding that the distinguished senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], who is the chairman of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and who was the author of the original Library Services Act, is planning to submit a more comprehensive bill on this subject in the near future. I will fully support that measure when he finds it appropriate to bring it to the attention of the Senate, because it is clear that this basic library program is of tremendous educational and recreational benefit to millions of Americans in all walks of life.

Action will be required soon, since the present act is scheduled to expire on June 30, 1961.

This bill fills an important gap in our educational system. It brings to the rural areas the books and other library services that are so vital to self-improvement beyond the basic educational requirement. It helps extend to each of our citizens, no matter how remote from the urban centers of communication, the tools for being an intelligent and well-informed citizen.

Mr. President, because of Texas vast geographical area and substantial rural population, the Library Services Act constitutes an important adjunct to our basic educational program. It is a program which thousands of Texans have come to use and to appreciate.

Mr. Witt B. Harwell, the distinguished State librarian of Texas, informs me that nearly 50 Texas counties are now being served through this program and that officials of several dozen other counties have given notice that their citizens also want and need this excellent library service. In its first year, the Library Services Act resulted in the formation of several local permanent libraries in Texas and otherwise greatly increased the circulation of existing libraries. I am grateful for the opportunity to add my name to cosponsorship of this fine bill.

ADDRESSES, EDITORIALS, ARTICLES, ETC., PRINTED IN THE RECORD

On request, and by unanimous consent, addresses, editorials, ariticles, etc., were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. DIRKSEN:

Address on economic trends, labor and management conferences, and the steel strike, delivered by Secretary of Labor James P. Mitchell before the Economic Club of Detroit on January 11, 1960.

By Mr. RUSSELL:

Address entitled "Citizenship Versus the Power Groups," delivered by George Romney, president of American Motors Corp., before the Commonwealth Club of California on September 4, 1959.

By Mr. NEUBERGER:

Editorial entitled "Another Tom Dooley," from the Milwaukee (Oreg.) Review of November 19, 1959, commenting on the Criss award of the Mutual of Omaha Insurance Co., to Dr. Thomas A. Dooley.

PUBLICATION OF CERTAIN INFORMATION CONCERNING EMPLOYEES AND EXPENDITURES OF SENATE COMMITTEES; TERMS OF SENATE PAGES

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], chairman of the Appropriations Committee, has two resolutions which he would like to have considered.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, if there is no objection, I wish to call attention to two Senate housekeeping resolutions, so to speak, which require immediate attention.

One of them is Calendar No. 1051, Senate Resolution 213, which provides for repealing the resolution requiring the semiannual publication in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of certain information concerning employees and expenditures of Senate committees. The resolution which would be repealed was adopted by the Senate in 1949. The same information is now furnished 4 times a year in a separate publication, and then annually in the report of the Secretary of the Senate.

The other resolution relates to six Senate pages who have attained age 17; and it is the desire of all concerned that they be allowed to finish their school term.

I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Calendar No. 1051, Senate Resolution 213.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I should like to ask about the resolutions.

Mr. HAYDEN. The first resolution provides for repealing the resolution which requires publication in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of certain information in regard to employees and expenditures of Senate committees.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I wish to inquire about the resolution which relates to pages.

Mr. HAYDEN. That is a very simple resolution, and I shall read it:

Resolved, That Senate Resolution 14, 81st Congress, agreed to January 13, 1949, is amended to read as follows:

"That in no case shall a page of the Senate be appointed for duty in the Senate Chamber who is younger than 14 years of age and who has not completed the 8th grade of school, or is 17 years of age or older, except that those enrolled in the Senate page school who attain age 17 may serve as pages through the session of the Senate in which the page-school year terminates."

There are at the present time, three Republican pages and three Democratic pages who are, or are about to become, 17 years of age. The resolution adopted in 1949 provides that when pages attain age of 17 they must be removed. This resolution allows them to continue in the service of the Senate to the end of the page-school year.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I wish to know whether they can be appointed at age 17 and can continue in the service until they are 21.

Mr. HAYDEN. No; the rule will remain that they cannot serve after they are 17—except if they are already in the service of the Senate, they may finish out the school term. The page school is in fact a high school and those who graduate from it are qualified to pass college entrance examinations.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. They can only finish the school term; that is all?

Mr. HAYDEN. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request for the present consideration of Calendar No. 1051, Senate Resolution 213?

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 213) was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That S. Res. 123, Eightieth Congress, agreed to June 27, 1947, is hereby repealed.

TERMS OF SENATE PAGES

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I ask for the immediate consideration of Calendar No. 1052, Senate Resolution 218, which relates to the terms of Senate pages.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request for the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 218) was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That Senate Resolution 14, Eighty-first Congress, agreed to January 13, 1949, is amended to read as follows:

"That in no case shall a page of the Senate be appointed for duty in the Senate Chamber who is younger than fourteen years of age and who has not completed the eighth grade of school, or is seventeen years of age or older, except that those enrolled in the Senate page school who attain age seventeen may serve as pages through the session of the Senate in which the page-school year terminates."

EDUCATION IN RUSSIA

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD an article written by Mr. Forrest Rozzell, who is executive Secretary of the Arkansas Education Association. Recently he visited Russia; and he has written a very enlightening article about education as it is carried on in Russia.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Journal of Arkansas Education]

NOTES FROM RUSSIA

(By Forrest Rozzell)

When the AEA Board decided to send me on a trip to the Soviet Union, I immediately began asking myself some questions. Why am I going? What purposes do I have for making the trip? What purposes should I have? Of what value can my experiences be to the cause of education in Arkansas? What shall I look for? How shall I interpret what I observe? Do I have blind spots, stereotype concepts, or prejudices that need to guard against to help me in being more objective? How important are the details of school organization, administration, finance, curriculum, methods, etc.? As I thought about these and other questions I concluded that three assumptions and their logical implications would provide the guidelines for making the most out of my experiences.

The first assumption was: It is impossible to understand or appraise the educational system of any human society except within the total context of that society; therefore, I would try to observe and learn as much as possible about the political, economic, social, and moral aspects and principles of the Soviet system as a prerequisite to understanding and interpreting what I observed about the Russian educational system.

The second assumption was: Details are relatively unimportant in contrast to the philosophy, purposes, and objectives that motivate and give direction to the actions that are taking place in the schools of the Soviet Union. The important point is not where the Soviet system is now, but rather where it is going. Even though our opportunities to observe political, economic, social, and educational conditions would be limited, we should be able to see, hear, and read enough to draw some reasonably valid conclusions about the great and sweeping changes that have been and are taking place in the Soviet Union.

The third assumption was: Great truths, great ideals, are many times stated in sentences so simple that we lose sight of their greatness. As a result of constant repetition we are prone to permit the utterance to replace the realization. As a consequence a person cannot fully understand and appreciate the culture of which he is a part unless he studies it in relation to or in contrast with other cultures; therefore, out of the trip I hoped to secure sufficient rational knowledge about the Russian culture—including its educational system—to establish points of reference for deeper insights and understanding of American education and its role in the preservation and extension of our great ideas, ideals, and institutions.

This report on my observations and their interpretation should be evaluated in the light of the foregoing assumptions and their logical implications.

RATIONAL KNOWLEDGE, FREEDOM'S FOUNDATION

One of our great ideals is freedom of thought, speech, and conscience—the right to think as one wills and to speak as one thinks. This right can be negated as effectively by a paralyzing fear of criticism as by a paralyzing fear of the Soviet's secret police. It would be easy to make a factually accurate report of my observations and conclusions that would be entirely consistent with the stereotyped concepts of Russia that prevail too extensively in the United States today, but such a report would be unbalanced; and rational knowledge, accurate and balanced, is the only secure foundation for freedom. Security from criticism is neither a Judeo-Christian nor democratic ideal, and no individual or nation that seeks it has ever made, in the seeking, a contribution to the elimination of tyranny of any kind. Unmistakably the basic issue in East Germany, Poland, and the Soviet Union is tyranny—a monolithic, doctrinaire system engulfing every form of human thought and behavior.

What I write is based upon my convictions, now more firmly entrenched than ever, that the basic ideas and ideals of our heritage can compete successfully with any and all others in winning the minds and loyalties of peoples everywhere, provided we do not encrust our ideals with an American orthodoxy that stifles their creative force and universal appeal, and provided also that we do not encrust those of other cultures with stereotyped concepts that deny their humanistic appeal.

The big job facing us is to convince ourselves as well as the uncommitted peoples of the world that what free men have to offer in terms of the good life is far superior to that which the U.S.S.R. is pushing. Ignorance of their system can be fatal; ignorance of our own as an example of what free men can accomplish can be equally fatal. In this struggle I am convinced that the Soviet Union cannot win; but we can lose through our failure, because of irrational fears, to counteract Communist doctrines through the intelligent use of factual and authentic knowledge about its aims and methods, its strengths and weaknesses.

POLICY OF SELECTIVE IGNORANCE

I have never been able to understand why anyone in America should object to teaching about communism in our schools and colleges. I have felt that the failure to do so constituted a policy of selective ignorance which is completely incompatible with the philosophy, objectives, and processes of education in a free society. I am now firmly convinced that the failure to teach about the aims and methods, the strengths and weaknesses of communism, both the theoretical kind and the Russian variety, is sheer folly. There is no reason to fear Communist doctrines and methods when there is a free intercourse of ideas, ideals, and processes. I have no fear of the Communist brainwashing our children and youth. On the contrary, I wish every youth and adult in America could visit the Soviet Union and see first hand communism in operation, and no special guardians of our faith would need to accompany them.

By visiting Berlin, both the eastern and western sectors, and Warsaw before visiting the Soviet Union, we had an opportunity to see first hand the Soviet variety of imperial communism at work. The overriding purpose behind every thought, every plan, and every act in East Germany and Poland, the same as in the Soviet Union, is to instill and inculcate Communist doctrines, to develop the Communist state, and to secure its acceptance by the people—all in accordance with the teachings of "Father Lenin." This forthright identification of purpose in East Germany and Poland with the Soviet Union was a surprise to me. While I knew that the influence and power of the Soviet Union were behind what was happening in the satellite countries, I thought that there would be some effort to be subtle about it.

PROPAGANDA AS A TECHNIQUE

Wherever the Communist dictators have the power, symbol-manipulation as a means of changing ideas, attitudes, and actions along predetermined lines—propaganda—is one of its major techniques. But we too use propaganda as a means of mass persuasion; however, the weakness of the appeal of ours may result from our failure to recognize that propaganda always has a setting within a social, cultural framework, without which neither its psychological nor its cultural features can be understood. We do not have a corner, either on slogans and cliches or on ideals and platitudes, but one significant difference is that those of the Soviet appeal to a future hope, while ours appeal to the preservation of the status quo. Reality is always at a disadvantage when competing with hope.

The Communist leaders have usurped for their evil purposes words that throughout history have symbolized the hopes and aspirations of mankind: peace, democracy, liberation, love, happiness, freedom, education. Through suggestion and related psychological techniques these symbols are manipulated within the social-cultural framework of the people to whom they are directed. On the contrary, our manipulation of these symbols is almost exclusively confined to our own social-cultural framework. As a consequence, we do not make ourselves understood by the uncommitted peoples of the world.

BATTLE FOR LOYALTIES OF YOUTH

One fact that was demonstrated more clearly in East Germany than in Poland or the Soviet Union is that the great battle of our time is for the minds and loyalties of children and youth. In East Germany the Russian dictators know they cannot win the minds and loyalties of the adults of the present but they believe that they can win the children and youth. Thoughtful Germans fear they can also—"Hitler did, why can't they?"

One German, a major in the last war, definitely anti-Communist, told us that his nephew, 9 years old, who lives in East Germany, visited him a few weeks before. His parents are anti-Communists, but he believes that Khrushchev is the greatest leader and defender of the working people in the world today and is doing more to promote world peace than anyone else.

The situation poses the question: Can a free system that is dedicated to the enhancement of universal, individual freedom, dignity, and welfare compete successfully with a totalitarian system that subordinates the individual to the state? The Russians, the people as well as their leaders, obviously believe that it cannot. They think that time is on their side.

CONTRASTS IN EAST AND WEST BERLIN

We were all amazed by the contrasts between the Eastern and Western sectors of Berlin. The impact of the contrasts cannot be fully described. There are, of course, significant material differences such as the vast amount of rebuilding in the West and the shoddiness of that in the East; the difference in the amount and quality of consumer goods and the number of cars; the presence of so many policemen and soldiers in old Nazi uniforms in the East; but the most impressive contrasts were in the number, the attitude, and the looks of the people.

To me, the most discouraging experience of our whole trip was in East Berlin. What is happening in East Germany today convinced me that tyranny over the mind of man cannot be eliminated by force. Force merely replaces one form of tyranny with another form. What we saw in East Germany in 1959 had a sickening similarity to that which prevailed in the 1930's under the Nazi. The basic motives of the leaders, the motivations of the people, the methods employed, and the symbol-manipulations are the same; only "the devil" has been changed. The "American capitalist" has been substituted for the "Jew." Here communism is revealed for what it is—a technique of power, a system of state organization based upon political rather than economic determinism, tyranny.

The vast majority of East Germans are most anxious to keep West Berlin free. It is a symbol of hope for reunification; it provides an opportunity for concrete comparisons between life in the free zone and life in the Soviet zone; it provides a source for merchandise needed by individuals; and it provides a final refuge, if life becomes intolerable in the Eastern sector. Many East Germans do fear, however, that the West Germans are becoming so prosperous that they will forget the 17 million Germans living in the East.

THE YOUTH ORGANIZATIONS

One East Berlin woman to whom we talked has a 15-year-old son whom she wishes to have religious training. While such training is not directly prohibited, the boy cannot become a member of the "Youth Organizations" if he takes it. The future outlook for any youth outside the "Organizations" is not very bright. East German youth are very much confused and frustrated by the conflicting information they receive from East and West Berliners by word of mouth, by the few newspapers smuggled in from the West, and by radio. There is no way the East German leaders can jam the West Berlin radios without doing the same for their own.

On October 7, the day we left Berlin, in East Germany they were celebrating the 10th anniversary of the founding of the German Democratic Republic. There was a huge crowd in East Berlin, but there should have been; all workers were compelled to attend In each establishment meetings were held to inform the employees as to what was expected of them. On the day of the celebration all employees met at their place of work and marched as a group in the parade. When asked what would happen to anyone who failed to do so, we were told that he would be called in and asked to explain. If the explanation was not acceptable he would suffer inconveniences.

During our brief visit to East Berlin the party line was evident everywhere. Even then party line was a term of derision to me—something parroted by the people without conviction. After 2 days in Warsaw, the term began to have a different meaning; after 21 days in the Soviet Union, I no longer think of it as a term of derision—while it may be something parroted by the people, they do it with conviction.

POLAND AND THE U.S.S.R.

Warsaw was a city approximately 90 percent destroyed during the war, with a death list of 800,000 people; yet it has done a remarkable job of building, rebuilding, and restoring. The largest building in the city, the one that can be seen from almost every point in the city, is a gift from the U.S.S.R., the Palace of Culture. This, of course, is dedicated to "peace and friendship."

What has happened and is happening in East Germany and Poland was made possible by the ravages of war. This is a point we should never forget. In both places, after the war, the most compelling objective was the satisfaction of the basic needs of the people: clothing, food, shelter. Only the governments, and they were naturally under Soviet influence, had the power and resources to act, and they did. This they did in accordance with Communist doctrines. Because of different circumstances, more obvious force was required in East Germany than in Poland; consequently less has been done in East Berlin than in Warsaw in satisfying the basic needs of the people, particularly the housing needs.

Poland, like East Germany, is a Communist state; the kind that is far different from those operations in the United States that are characterized as communistic in the cliches of some individuals and groups. In Poland, as in East Germany and the Soviet Union, the Communist Party, a self-perpetuating hierarchy, is the Government. Practically everything is under its control: it builds and assigns apartments; it provides jobs, sets hours, wages, and prices; it determines national and foreign policy; it determines and supervises the implementation of educational policy.

PSYCHOLOGICAL MOTIVATIONS

In bringing about the sociopolitical and economic changes that are now and have been taking place in Poland, it appeared to me that the Government is capitalizing on at least four psychological motivations of the people: (1) Their abhorrence of war. The Poles want peace at almost any price so long as their basic needs are fairly well satisfied. Peace is constantly emphasized. (2) Their hatred of the Nazis. With just cause the Poles hate the Nazis. They are constantly reminded of this by plaques and monuments which perpetuate the crimes and atrocities of the Nazis. This is quite a contrast with the Palace of Culture, which reminds them of the friendship of the Soviets. (3) Their national cultural pride. At first I wondered why a utilitarian state would spend so much time, effort, and money in the restoration of the old town, the palaces that house the university, the art collection, and others. But all of these promote pride in their own national culture. At the same time the former insignificant role and low status of the people is preserved. The restoration is designed to say to them "Yes, we can take pride in our cultural heritage; we can preserve the good in it, but at the same time we can all become a more significant part of it, and we and our children can benefit more from it." (4) Their religious heritage. Approximately 90 percent of all Poles are members of the Roman Catholic Church. In contrast to Berlin, both East and West, practically all the churches of Warsaw have been restored, some by the state. As a result of an agreement between the Vatican and the Polish Government, a definite effort is being made by the Communists to make accommodations to the religious traditions of the people. This effort can lead to unrealistic interpretations in spite of evident seeds of conflict.

Because of these unifying influences, which do not prevail in East Germany except a desire for peace, there is not so much evidence of the police state in Poland as in East Germany. Nevertheless, the tyranny over the mind is just as great, perhaps greater, because there is no counter force such as West Berlin. This does not mean that the Poles are anti-American; they are not. But they are pro-U.S.S.R. And why shouldn't they be with Russia breathing down their necks?

HUMAN FREEDOM FOR HUMAN WELFARE

The U.S.S.R. is a vast and complex land of many nationalities, languages, and cultures characterized by contrasts, commitment, change, control, and confidence. Since 1917, under the rigidly planned and systematically executed control of the Communist dictatorship (always with little or no regard for human freedom and many times by methods which violate every principle of human justice) the Soviet Union has been moving steadfastly toward the perfection of its cultural revolution.

In many respects the results are remarkable. While objective analyses by competent authorities have tended to prove that the same or greater results in terms of human welfare could have been achieved without sacrificing human freedom, the controls of the party over thoughts and communications of all kinds are such that this proposition is now and will likely remain as long as the party is in power, an issue about which the vast majority of the citizens of the Soviet Union are completely oblivious. To them the party is due the credit; not one denies that the party is the government, in fact, they boast of it.

The people have been convinced that it is necessary to sacrifice human freedom in order to secure human welfare. They have no opportunity to learn about the "great American proposition" that human welfare and human freedom are mutually attainable goals, or about the extent to which we have achieved both in the United States. They are not aware of the fact that the "robber baron capitalism" of the 19th century no longer prevails in the United States. Their understanding of the American "system" is a projection of that which the Communist Manifesto was directed against—an understanding based upon almost complete ignorance of the facts of the 20th century. On the other hand, they are aware of the changes that have taken place in the Soviet Union which are making for a better material life for millions of people and holding out the same promise for millions of others. The extent of the benefits in comparison with the propaganda of "the party" is, to say the least, debatable. While it is evident that a facade has been constructed to impress visitors and natives as well, the fact remains that the progress being made combined with the systematically planned and propagandized promises for the future and the rigid controls that are exercised are such as to retain for the foreseeable future the commitment of the people to the system.

EDUCATION AS KEY FACTOR

The rise of the Soviet Union to its present position of power would have been impossible without the phenomenal development of its educational system. This program of organized education, planned and executed by the Communist Party, is a key factor in understanding what is happening in the U.S.S.R. The leaders have marshaled all the forces of organized education, including many more than the schools and institutions of higher learning, to achieve their purposes and advance toward their ever-expanding goals. It is axiomatic that every human society perpetuates itself through organized and unorganized process of education and learning. If at any time these processes are interrupted for any extended period, the group loses its heritage and perishes. But in the Soviet Union the heritage-preserving role of education has been relegated to secondary status, and no role is left for unorganized learning and education. Education is an instrument of national policy, not to maintain the status quo, except for the leadership of the party, but to change the course of history and the nature of man.

Education in the Soviet Union is extremely broad in concept and in practice. It embraces the entire cultural apparatus, especially those agencies dealing with the conscious induction of ideas, opinions, and values in the minds of both young and old. It includes the schools from the nursery to the graduate schools of the university. For all practical purposes, it includes newspapers and periodicals, books and libraries, as well as radio and television. It includes all agencies of amusement and entertainment, and especially the political and cultural aspects of all organizations, particularly those for children and youth.

INFORMAL EDUCATION

The Soviet Union has an extraordinary program of highly organized after-school activities which are conducted in a more relaxed informal fashion than the school program. This supplementary program which makes learning fun may be an important key to the success of the Russian schools. Participants in these after-school activities are divided into three groups: the Octoberists include children ages 7–10; the Pioneers include children ages 10–15; and the Komsomols(the young Communist League) include young people ages 15–26.

The primary group in this movement is the Pioneers, a mass Communist organization for children who have pledged themselves to be true to the teachings of Lenin. The work of the Pioneers is closely coordinated with the school program: "The basic unit of Pioneer work is the Pioneer detachment in the school and cannot be separated from the work of the teacher." The work in the Pioneer palaces and houses is carried out by full-time employees who have the same qualifications as those who teach in the schools.

We found a school program in a state of flux in response to the law adopted by the Supreme Soviet in December 1958. To understand the Soviet school system, it is necessary to take into consideration the role of the State Planning Commission. This commission determines the immediate and long-range economic goals for the Union and then determines the resources, material and human, needed to reach these goals. The school program is then structured to produce the predetermined manpower needs.

CHANGING EMPHASIS IN EDUCATION

While the Communists seem never to tire of boasting about their schools, it is now apparent that the system in operation prior to 1958 had not produced the desired results in terms of Communist doctrines and goals. They have found that a 10-year school program devoted to a single academic curriculum is incompatible with the goals of universal education, even in a totalitarian state. In addition to the academic emphasis, which until recently has been almost exclusive in the Soviet general education schools, a drastically new emphasis is now being introduced. In a statement which preceded the enactment of the new school law Premier Khrushchev was quoted in Pravda as follows: "The most important and fundamental defect of our secondary and higher schools is their isolation from life. Our 10-year school at the present time has not solved the problem of preparing young people for life, but prepares them only to enter higher establishments."

"Preparation for life" appears to mean chiefly acquiring the ability and will to do skilled manual labor. Therefore, the 10-year school that has had the acclaim of some critics of American education is being replaced by a compulsory 8-year school which includes labor skills in its program. Students who have finished the 8-year program may (1) continue for 3 more years in a secondary school in which 2 days of the 6-day week must be spent on the job at production training, or (2) he may go to work full-time and continue his schooling for 3 more years in the evening, or (3) he may discontinue school altogether.

Perhaps the single greatest difficulty Americans face in trying to understand the Russian school system is their upgrading of educational nomenclature. They have no vocational training; they have production training. They have no general science; they have various levels of physics, chemistry, and biology; and auto mechanics is applied physics. There are no such subjects as the social sciences or economics in the sense that we use and teach them. Driver training is not a frill, it is production training.

EDUCATION FOR MANPOWER NEEDS

The educational programs of the universities and colleges are also structured to meet the manpower needs as determined by the State Planning Commission. The number of students who are permitted to study engineering, law, medicine, the various sciences, teaching, and so forth, is determined by present and future manpower needs. College students are members of a select group whose future is filled with hope for status in the new order. Competition is keen both to get in and stay in. Tuition is free and students are paid a stipend while attending. If their work is superior, they are given bonuses in the form of added stipends and even paid vacations. However, only about one out of every four students who qualify for admission to college is admitted.

When he finishes college, the graduate is assigned a job, and a resident of Moscow may be assigned a job in Siberia. While he is not required to take the assigned job, if he does not, he will find it almost impossible to secure another.

INSTRUMENT OF NATIONAL POLICY

The business of organized education is regarded far more seriously in the U.S.S.R. than in the United States. The highest authorities pay close and constant attention to it, and they pay more than attention, since approximately 10 percent of the total national income is devoted to education. The top political leaders of the Soviet Union are dedicated to and use organized universal education as the single most important instrument of national policy. At the same time, however, they rely on professional educators to plan, organize, and administer the educational programs with a minimum of nonprofessional interference, so long as Communist doctrines are not violated.

There is a dictatorship in the U.S.S.R. today in the most imaginative and ruthlessly calculated sense of the term. Undergirded by an abiding faith in the magic of science, it is relentlessly driving to perfect its cultural revolution. There are those who contend that the Communist seizure of power has turned out to be a revolution of method rather than substance. While this judgment may prove to be correct in the course of history, I do not agree as of the present, and it is not so believed by a vast majority of the Russians today.

RUSSIAN SYSTEM AND ETHICAL VALUES

The greatest mistake we could make, I am convinced, is to attempt to write off or seal off the Russian system as solely atheist materialism which will somehow fall of its own shortcomings or from the wrath of God. Even though "religion" has been rejected as a motivation, and "religious institutions," as a source of power competing for the minds and loyalties of the people, are not permitted; even though religious doctrines and faith are being supplanted by Communist doctrines and faith through a systematic plan of indoctrination; in spite of this the Russian system is neither amoral nor lacking in a social ethic.

In terms of human welfare one must admit that in moral and ethical values the current regime has more to offer the people than that against which the revolution, in its inception, was directed. This is evident in the contrasts. One example we saw was a sixth century monastery, high upon a mountain, inaccessible to the people, and a power dam at the foot of the mountain presided over by a huge statue of Lenin. This is only a single example of the contrasts, many of them deliberately contrived, that the dictatorship is using as visual aids to secure acceptance of and commitment to Communist doctrines.

To understand the Russian system one should consider factual observations, even when they might be distasteful. We have, unfortunately I believe, developed a mindset wherein there can be no acceptable morality, ethics, or motivations which do not bear the imprimatur of Judeo-Christian traditions and institutions. I hold no brief for any phase of the tyranny that prevails in the U.S.S.R. today. On the contrary, I detest all of it. I hope, however, that my detestation will not lead me to the uncritical rejection of knowledge essential to logical thinking and sound judgments. Only the devotees of a monolithic system contend that their system is wholly good and that all others are wholly bad. Regardless of extenuating qualifications, this is tyranny. The fact is, no system is entirely good and no system is entirely bad.

POSITIVE MOTIVATIONS

While Communist doctrines as they are taught and observed in the Soviet Union recognize neither the essential dignity of the individual nor the desirability of individual liberty, which to me are all important they do appeal to many compelling, positive motivations. Among these are: peace, friendship, concern for mankind everywhere (the brotherhood of man); a sense of national destiny reminding me of that which the ancient Hebrews felt for Israel; ethical humanism with an emphasis upon human welfare (the good life for all); equality of all as well as equality of opportunity and consideration (all men are created equal); man is master of his own fate; educational development as the key to national as well as individual success; appreciation for the cultural arts and skills (this does not apply to the creative arts); forthright recognition of the pragmatic necessity for planning for desired results in a complex world; science holds the key to the supernatural. Before explaining these away on the grounds that in terms of Communist purposes and methods they have entirely different meanings from the ones we attach to them, we should try to understand their appeal to the peoples of the Soviet Union in their current and past environment. When we do, we may understand better what is happening and what needs to be done to offset their appeal.

HOW TO COUNTERACT SOVIET POWER

As I see it, the basic issue posed by the Soviet system—and organized education is a key factor in this system—must be divided into two phases: the immediate and the long-range. The immediate phase is to counteract Soviet power and its potential use for world domination. This is a task for the experts, but not exclusively the military experts who, in our society, are morally obligated to a policy of defensiveness; and defensiveness in the affairs of men in the contemporary world is not a sufficient reason for action. The present potential for human devastation possessed by both the Soviet Union and the United States raises serious doubts as to whether or not military approaches and solutions even in a cold war can possibly be beneficial to either of these nations or the world. The military approach, wherever it is used, inevitably resolves the growing conflict between the private person and the social group—the conflict between the moral individual and the military state—in favor of the latter. We desperately need the counsel of scientists of all kinds, especially the social and political scientists; we need the counsel of economic, educational, and religious experts as well. As a Nation we need help in discovering the practical and moral reasons for being responsible for others—reasons which are more than the parroting of the pat prescriptions of the church and the military establishment—rational, logical, dynamic reasons which emerge in response to the urge of the responsible reforms our liberal arts and religious training call for. We need help in learning the current realities of human conditions throughout the world. We need help in realizing that the ultimate human goal is moral and social solidarity in the family of man in a spirit of responsible freedom rather than in a spirit of monolithic, doctrinaire orthodoxy. There can be no free society without free men, and in a free society the people must ever assume the responsibility for the decisions of their government and the consequences of those decisions.

Whatever is done to counteract Soviet power must take into consideration the long-range phase of the basic issue. This is not one of "isms"; it is not communism versus Americanism; it is not communism versus capitalism; it is not atheism versus Protestantism or Catholicism. Freedom is not the byproduct of any system or "ism." Fundamentally, the long-range phase of the issue is intellectual freedom; the right to believe, to think, to speak, to act, to seek for, to plan, and to use all methods and resources for the universal development of the creative capacities and powers of the mind of man and the free use of these powers to develop, refine, and redevelop those processes and systems—economic, political, social, religious, and educational—that will best meet the needs of man in a changing environment—the fulfillment of the spirit of man. No monolithic, doctrinaire system of indoctrination can do this, regardless of its avowed objectives.

UNIVERSAL FREE EDUCATION, MAN'S HOPE

I am now more convinced than ever that the ultimate hope of man lies in universal free education that is wide enough in range and scope, thorough enough in content, and challenging enough in quality to provide for each individual, within the limits of his capacities, enough knowledge—accurate and balanced—to give a sufficient understanding of the nature of man and his environment that will make it possible to develop and use all necessary and democratic means of controlling man's nature and environment for the good of mankind. But this is becoming an increasingly difficult task because we are living in a rapidly changing, highly complex, and frustratingly confusing world.

The Russian people believe profoundly in the truth of their way of life, and they are supremely confident that their methods provide the only sure means for the final fulfillment of the hopes and aspirations of mankind everywhere. Do we possess as profound a belief in our way of life? Do we have as great confidence in our methods? Are we still dedicated to a proposition? Are the truths of the American dream still self-evident? Are we still aspiring, striving, fighting for what we believe—for the fulfillment of our proud ethical, moral, and political ideals and traditions?

DEDICATION TO DEMOCRATIC PROCESSES

What is desperately needed in America today is a revival of faith in and dedication to freedom, the self-evident truths of the American dream, the absolute necessity of free, universal education, and faith in the dedication to democratic processes. With such a revival of faith and dedication, organized education in the United States would become a key instrument of national policy—policy which is consistent with our ideals, traditions, and purposes. In implementing this policy the Congress of the United States would enact legislation which would allocate to the several States financial support on the basis of an objective formula, leaving the discretion to no Federal officer or agency to determine the amount, and then permitting the already established educational officers and agencies in the several States to administer these Federal funds for educational purposes under State laws and constitutions. We can have a national policy which recognizes the importance of the role of organized public education by granting substantial financial support to it and at the same time do no violence to the principle of State and local autonomy in the control and management of our public schools. To contend otherwise is to deny the effectiveness and reliability of democratic processes.

The best example of the lack of faith in democratic ideals and processes in America today is provided by the persistent refusal of the Congress and the administration to do anything of significance to bolster our lagging, inadequate public education program and to offer as the excuse for their failure the cliche "Federal support means Federal control." By our actions we proclaim to the uncommitted peoples of the world that the people of the United States, the bastion of the free world, can do nothing through their Federal Government to support free public education because in the process the Government of the United States will become a freedom-destroying monster. This is not true. The Congress of the United States can provide substantial financial support for our public schools in a way that will not do violence to any cherished principles at any time that it sees fit to do so. It will do so only when the people of the United States insist upon it.

NO INSURMOUNTABLE PROBLEMS

In the United States, what we decide to do we can do. There are no insurmountable problems. The Russian people believe that no sacrifice is too great so long as it helps in the furtherance of Communist doctrines and objectives. They have the energy, the drive, the dedication; in contrast, we seem to be drifting in aimless confusion, lacking in courage and a sense of responsibility. We have ample resources—material, human, ideological—to win the struggle for the minds and the loyalties of the uncommitted peoples of the world. What is lacking is the desire, the impulse, the will to act. We need a program, and public education is an essential aspect of any such program, that will tap the vigor and will challenge the faith and imagination of people everywhere, but the beginning must be with the people of the United States. We must accept as the basis of responsible action the implications of our own faith. In the United States, with sufficient concern and conviction on the part of the people, policy and action by the Government will automatically follow, if not immediately, then assuredly after an election or two.

OUR MISSILE AND SPACE PROGRAM

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a series of four articles which recently appeared in the Washington Post. They concern our missile and space program. The articles are extremely well written, and, I think, contain information which should be of profound interest to all Members of this body, as well as the public. I believe it is well worth while to bring them together in a consecutive arrangement that is convenient for all to read.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPACE LAG A PUZZLER WITH ATLASES STANDING

BY

(By Edward Gamarekian)

A babel of charges, denials, explanations, and counter charges is expected in Congress when the Senate and House Space Committees get down to a reexamination of this country's space program in the next few weeks.

There is little tangible evidence that the gap between the United States and the Soviet Union is being closed, and some now think that it is actually being widened.

More than 2 years have passed since the launching of the first sputniks and the United States has yet to match what the Soviets did at the very start. Sputnik II, launched November 3, 1957, weighed 1,120 pounds. The largest payloads the United States has placed in orbit are the 440-pound capsules of the military satellite project Discoverer.

The Russians have launched three lunar probes, weighing, respectively, 797, 858, and 614 pounds. Each completed its apparently intended mission, the first passing close to the moon and going into orbit around the sun; the second hitting the moon close to the center and the third going behind the moon to take photographs of the far side.

The largest lunar probe launched by the United States weighed only 39 pounds and it went only one-third of the way to the moon. A 13.4-pound unit was sent past the moon into orbit around the sun.

From the timetable announced by the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, this country will not attempt to match the Soviet accomplishments before late 1960. Why is it taking so long?

During the past 2 years the American people were told that this country was behind because it did not have the large rockets needed to send large payloads into space. This reason no longer holds. The 360,000-pound-thrust Atlas missile has been ready for several months.

Although it doesn't have quite as much thrust as the Russian rockets, it can loft comparable and even larger payloads with the right upper stages. Why isn't it being fed into the space program at a rapid enough rate to achieve some notable success? Because the administration says it cannot afford it.

Only two Atlases were scheduled for use in the space program in 1959. One was fired in a reentry test of the Mercury satellite which is expected to carry a man into orbit around the earth in 1961. The other was scheduled for a moon shot but blew up in a preliminary test.

AN UNSPOKEN REPLY

When the Russians made a lunar flight with the camera-carrying Lunik III in the first week of last October, a third Atlas was suddenly allocated for another try at the moon. The 130-pound instrumented payload that was supposed to go into orbit around the moon—something not yet done by anyone—barely got off the ground before electronic trouble led to failure.

The NASA says it doesn't know whether it will use one of its small 1960 supply of Atlases for another attempt. It has only six for its entire 1960 program. Four will be used for suborbital tests with the Mercury capsule. The other two will be used for a new rocket vehicle capable of launching payloads slightly larger than those already sent up by the Soviets.

If the new vehicle succeeds, American prestige may be restored by late 1960—provided the Soviets haven't done something more spectacular in the meantime. If there are some mishaps, our prestige will have to wait until more vehicles are available in 1961.

That is what has some people in this country disturbed. The reliability of a launching vehicle is always low. A million things can go wrong, and there may be several failures before all the bugs are worked out.

To place the responsibility for national prestige on a new, untried vehicle and then gamble on success with only two units is reckless, they argue.

Those who feel that drooping American prestige demands the launching of sizable satellites and space probes at the earliest possible date are bitterly attacking the Administration for not making a greater effort. Charges of "niggardliness" and "no sense of urgency" are being made in many quarters.

An official of the important NASA Jet Propulsion Laboratory, Dr. Eberhardt Rechtin, Chief of the Telecommunications Division, put it this way in a recent address in Los Angeles:

"At the present time, one of the most remarkable features of the U.S. position is the almost complete lack of urgency in the space program. The NASA budget is now somewhat less than what the United States pays to ship and store surplus wheat. Our space program costs less than $10 per year per U.S. adult, or, roughly, one evening's entertainment per year."

QUESTIONS OF BALANCE

The administration is defending its position by arguing that more Atlas missiles cannot be diverted to space projects without upsetting the Nation's defense and that an additional supply of the $4 million units cannot be procured without upsetting the budget. (The number of Atlases allocated to the military satellite program has not been disclosed.)

The "no sense of urgency" charge is also being thrown at the administration for not spending more on the Mercury man-in-space program and the 1½-million-pound-thrust boosters Saturn and Nova.

The Senate and House space committees are getting ready to give NASA a rough going over when Congress reconvenes. Last session, NASA officials kept insisting that they had enough money and couldn't use any more. They will have a hard time explaining their present plight without admitting that they underestimated the situation.

When NASA is asked if it needs more than the $800 million being budgeted for fiscal 1961, it will have an even more difficult time explaining that this, too, will be enough. It will have to try, however, on orders from the top.

UNITED STATES FAILS TO PARE RED ARMS LEAD—CRITICS OF REGIME NOTE SERIOUSNESS OF WEAPONS GAP

(By John G. Norris)

Ever since Sputnik I roared into the skies to tell the world the United States could be attacked by Russian-based rockets almost without warning, the Eisenhower administration has been trying to explain away the Soviet lead in missiles.

A combination of soothing sirup, secrecy, and Soviet smiles last year blunted the impact of the news that the U.S.S.R. will get a commanding superiority in operational ICBM's during the early 1960's.

But the hard fact of the "missile gap" and all it portends is still there. And events—since Congress went home last summer—make it plain that the Russian lead is widening rather than narrowing, and may be even more serious than administration critics then charged.

These developments include a still unannounced Pentagon upgrading of the accuracy and reliability of the ICBM and some little publicized happenings here and in the Soviet Union that downgrade the manned bomber.

Last winter, Neil H. McElroy, then Secretary of Defense, admitted publicly that if the Russians build all the ICBM's they can and if the United States produces the number it now plans, the U.S.S.R. will maintain a three-to-one lead through the early 1960's.

In explaining this unhappy ratio, he said it stemmed from an administration decision not to try to "match Russia, missile for missile" but to rely on American superiority in Air Force and carrier-based bombers, plus available ICBM's, IRBM's, and Polaris submarines.

Those who argued at that time and since that such a policy was too risky won support from an unexpected quarter yesterday. Gen. Maxwell D. Taylor, U.S. Army, retired, who, while Army Chief of Staff, contended that the United States had too much "massive deterrent" and too little conventional war strength, confessed that he has "reluctantly" come to accept the "reality and significance of the so-called missile gap."

GENERAL TAYLOR'S WARNING

"Somehow it must be made clear to our citizens that the Nation will face a serious crisis beginning about 1961," he said in a just-published book. "For a period of years thereafter, the balance of military strength will tip dangerously in favor of the Communist bloc unless we take drastic action now."

The clock is ticking but few pay attention. A responsible group, the Johns Hopkins University Washington Center for Foreign Policy Research, warned in a report to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee recently that the United States today is "both open and vulnerable to direction and devastating attack." Everyone yawned.

No responsible officials now in Government speak out in public to inform America of the dangerous drift.

Not one of them attempts to correct the impression given earlier by the administration that Soviet ICBM's were inaccurate. Yet since August, a series of successful American Atlas tests have demonstrated greater accuracy and reliability for ICBM's in general than most top officials anticipated.

The Atlas "CEP"—the "circular error probability" or margin by which it may be expected to miss a target—has been cut from 4 to 3 miles and may be dropped to 2. Considering the terrific blast of a thermonuclear warhead, this means that fewer missiles will be needed to assure destruction of a key target.

RUSSIA ALSO IMPROVES

Intelligence and missile-montoring evidence of Soviet T–3 ICBM tests lead officials to credit Russia with equivalent improvement in its bigger missile.

No one in Government has said publicly that this increased danger to Strategic Air Command bomber bases has altered the administration position before Congress last year that SAC can be relied on to knock out Russia. But last fall there was an official, though curiously veiled acknowledgement that Russian defenses against B–52s and B–47s had so improved that those SAC bombers no longer could expect to get through to their targets in Russia using long-accepted high level bombing tactics.

SAC spokesmen made the important admission in disclosing new and elaborate plans for alternate "tree top" approach bombing at Federal civil aviation meetings to explain the necessity of reserving air space corridors for such "Braille bomber" training.

It may be that SAC still will be able to do its job, but a recent top level Pentagon evaluation now concludes that the ICBM will achieve equal effectiveness with manned bombers in 1962, earlier than expected. And by 1966, bomber effectiveness may be degraded to limited use only.

Many measures can be taken to prolong the effective life of the U.S. bomber strong cards, but as a result of the administration's ironclad budget ceiling, it has been decided to take an additional gamble on a "bomber gap" on top of the "missile gap."

The administration has—

Canceled production of the missile-firing B–52B supersonic bomber.

Cut production of the B–58A bomber and stretched out production of the few which will be built.

Gone ahead with plans to deactivate B–47 squadrons the B–58's were to replace.

Canceled production orders for a highly sophisticated electronics-counter-measures system for B–52's, substituting some "more modest"—and cheaper—systems designed to help SAC bombers get through the Soviet air defense system.

Virtually dropped the 2,000-mile-an-hour B–70 program, designed to locate mobile or unknown Soviet missile sites. It will be continued only as an experimental plane.

Many of these actions were admitted only after word of the cancellations and cutbacks leaked out from industry.

Even with these cuts, by 1962–63 SAC's bomber force probably will be double that of "SUSAC"—the Russian strategic air force. But by then, the U.S.S.R. may have three to five times more ICBM's than the 200 American ICBM's now ordered.

Besides these "first generation" Atlas and Titan ICBM's now planned, the United States is working on a second-generation, solid-fueled Minuteman ICBM. But it will be 1964–65 before a major force of 600 to 700 Minutemen can be in service.

By then, if Minuteman can be made mobile and/or a sizable number of U.S. Polaris submarines are on station and there is no war, the Nation's major trouble may be over. For truly secure deterrent nuclear force would solve many problems.

POLARIS A YEAR AWAY

But the United States will not have its first Polaris craft operational for another year and can have only 9 of the 16-missile subs in service by late 1963. But no more are being laid down this year or funded in the 1961 budget.

Moreover, Russia is presenting an ominous submarine-based missile threat. NATO's Atlantic commander, Adm. Jerauld Wright, said recently that there is conclusive evidence the Russians will have a significant ballistic missile sub threat against the United States within a year and a dangerous one in subsequent years.

American officials are confident that the Soviet subs, at first, will be greatly inferior to the Polaris nuclear craft. But numbers could count.

In other missiles, Russia is way ahead of the United States. The Soviets have several hundred medium range missiles of 600- to 1,200-mile range, plus some of 1,800 miles and well over a thousand with 300-mile range or better. Most of them are mobile.

In contrast, the U.S. picture is dismal. Forty American-built 1500-mile Thors are becoming operational in Britain. Turkey recently agreed to accept a squadron of 10 IRBM's, but Italy—the only other U.S. ally which will accept this fixed base, "soft" missile—has done little to install the 20 American IRBM's it agreed to take last March. Some dozen 200-mile U.S. Army Redstone ballistic missiles are in Europe.

Last winter, McElroy told Congress that Russian IRBM's did not figure in the American-Soviet missile comparison, as the U.S.S.R. "had not risked" moving them into the Red satellites, where they could reach American SAC bases in Britain, Spain and Morocco. Now the Pentagon admits to clear evidence that mobile Soviet IRBM's are in East Germany. It has not yet corrected the public record on this, however.

CRASH PROGRAM OUT

As to an ICBM defense, the Defense Department again last fall turned down urgent Army pleas to start crash construction of the Nike-Zeus, while continuing its development. This means no ballistic missile defense at least until the middle sixties, although ICBM radar warning stations should be ready by early 1962.

In face of all this, what is the administration doing?

There are some plans, but mighty little cash so far to finance them.

An Air Force plan to put some 60 Atlas or Titan ICBM's in dispersed, underground sites during the next 3 years has met tentative administration favor. So have preparations for an around-the-clock B–52 air alert to assure that a surprise Russian missile would not destroy all of SAC's retaliatory force on the ground.

Proposals to put more Atlases on "soft" sites and 1,200-mile Polaris missiles on surface warships have been rejected. The Pentagon cannot see where the extra billions to pay for the limited number of additional "hard" ICBM's and air alert is coming from out of the ironclad $41 billion budget, much less to try to bridge the missile gap.

As a result, the once all powerful American ability to wreak massive retaliation on an aggressor is fast declining.

SOVIET ARMS GAIN LAID TO U.S. POLICY—ARMY CUTBACKS HIT AMERICAN POTENTIAL FOR LIMITED WAR

(By John G. Norris)

At a meeting of the National Security Council in July 1957, the then Defense Secretary Charles E. Wilson declared that the Nation's basic military policy was to "maximize air power and minimize the foot soldier."

Gen. Maxwell D. Taylor, then Army Chief of Staff, who reports the incident in a just published book, said his words were accepted by all present as a "correct if colloquial" description of the Eisenhower administration's military strategy.

Wilson was arguing for a further reduction in the Army, which has suffered a cut in divisions from 20 to 14 and a slash in manpower from 1,500,000 to 870,000 since General Eisenhower became President.

Some reduction from the Korean war level was expected, of course, but Taylor and his predecessor, Gen. Matthew B. Ridgway, left office embittered over the way President Eisenhower treated their service. They believed a million-man Army to be essential—925,000 at rock bottom—but were most incensed over what they considered "starvation" in weapons modernization funds.

For the Eisenhower "bigger bang for a buck" program provided precious little for Army conventional warfare capabilities. (Hindsight shows that the Army might be better off today if it had not put so much into the Jupiter IRBM, later given to the Air Force. But where would the U.S. space program be today without the Jupiter rockets?)

The Army's frustration over this starvation was heightened by a succession of annual Moscow May Day parades showing off a wide variety of new Soviet Army weapons. During the 1950's, in fact, the Red army has remedied almost all of its wartime weaknesses.

During this time Russia also has cut army manpower to about 2,500,000 men but, with many fewer service troops than the United States, it has retained 175 active combat divisions.

Some of these—like America's 17 Army and marine divisions—are under strength, but the Soviet Union's tough, 3-year draft has produced several million young and ready reservists to fill up their ranks quickly.

Russian conscripts get longer, tougher training than American draftees. The Soviet GI, noncom, and junior officer are less able to exercise initiative than their U.S. counterparts. But U.S.S.R. difficulties in maintaining mechanical and communications equipment which American experts expected reportedly have not shown up in maneuvers.

Because of its modernization, the big Red Army is more powerful today than ever. Strong in armor and cross-country mobility, the Red army and its integrated air force is well prepared to fight either an atomic or conventional war.

As a result of the "minimize the foot soldier" policy, however, the U.S. Army is in a relatively weaker position today vis-a-vis Russia than was true 7 years ago. This is the case with respect to U.S. conventional war capability in general.

Unless Premier Nikita S. Khrushchev really meant what he said about drastically cutting the Red army—and the skeptics are legion—this situation may grow worse. For despite a slight increase in Army weapons modernization funds after the retirement of Secretary Wilson and of Adm. Arthur W. Radford as chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff there is talk of another large Army cut in 1962.

ARMY RELIES ON TAC

The Army, of course, is not the only American instrument of limited warfare. It relies on the separate Air Force Tactical Air Command for airlift and close air support; but TAC has not fared very well, either, under the Eisenhower administration's emphasis on massive deterrent forces.

The Navy and Marine Corps, however, represent a major exception to the increasing Soviet conventional warfare lead—the one bright spot in an otherwise dismal picture.

American seapower surpasses that of Russia. The combination of the Navy's aircraft carriers, amphibious ships and integrated Marine ground-air forces provide an effective way of dealing with many cold and limited war situations. But other potential trouble spots are inaccessible by sea and the Soviet Union has built large submarine and land-based air forces to oppose the American Navy.

Furthermore—and this gets to the heart of the Pentagon infighting over strategy—the Marines are not big enough to fight a sizable limited war.

PENTAGON'S POLICY

The Pentagon rationale for cutting the Army is found in the oft-repeated statement that the United States will never fight another Korea. This reflects current policy that the United States will employ its tactical atomic weapons or even bigger nuclear bombs to make up for its lack of manpower and conventional firepower in anything more than a small brushfire.

The fallacy of this stand, many believe is that American decisionmakers might well shy away from use of nuclear weapons—as at Dienbienphu. For the Soviets may well have as many tactical A-weapons as the United States, if not more. This is a field in which the Pentagon has lagged so much that Atomic Energy Commission Chairman John A. McCone had to prod the military a year ago into listing its requirements.

This lack of superiority in tactical A-weapons and the disinclination to use them could mean a greater likelihood of nonnuclear limited war, either between allies or satellites of the two major world powers or with one or the other directly involved.

It is here that the relative capacity of conventional or dual-purpose American and Soviet weapons becomes important. For one thing, both have been arsenals for their respective worlds.

U.S. armor—more important today than ever before—probably suffers most by comparison with the U.S.S.R.

The Red army is numerically stronger in tanks—unit for unit—than the American Army, and with over 100 tank or mechanized divisions in being, many times stronger overall.

Qualitatively, Soviet tanks are superior. Russia's chief battle tank, the T–54, has much greater cruising range than the current American Patton, yet is 12 tons lighter. The T–54, though slightly inferior in fire control and ammunition, outguns the Patton.

A not-yet-operational replacement for the Patton—the M–60—will have much greater range and a good, new British gun, but is disappointly heavy. The Army is utilizing what is essentially the old Patton chassis to save money rather than designing a completely new tank. Some experts question whether it will be much superior to the 9-year-old T–54.

STORY OF A FAILURE

The story of the Ontos tank-destroyer flop—another attempt to build a cut-rate weapon—is illuminating. It is especially so because outgoing Defense Secretary Neil H. McElroy, in his final news conference, cited the Marine Corps' Ontos as an example of American progress in conventional arms.

This couldn't be further from the fact. The Ontos (the word means "the thing" in Greek) sounds and looks impressive. It was developed by the Army in the pre-Korean economy days when its recoilless rifles—beefed-up bazookas—seemed like a cheap alternative to a costly postwar tank program. After the Defense Department Weapons System Evaluation Group rejected Ontos for many reasons, the Marine Corps took it over simply because nothing else was in sight for beachhead use. Already, however, the Marines are evaluating West German and French replacements for the still in delivery Ontos.

In infantry and artillery weapons, the Soviet Union has produced a whole new family to replace inferior World War II types. It has exported many of these weapons to its satellites and even to some Arab nations it has been courting. American forces, and most of the Allies too, are still equipped with pre-World War II Garand rifles and field artillery—and World War I-type machineguns and automatic rifles.

EFFECTIVE BUT TOO HEAVY

American light arms now in the hands of the troops are effective but overly heavy. U.S. artillery is good but largely still truck-towed rather than tracked and self-propelled. Soviet small arms are lighter though of shorter range. And the Russians have more self-propelled artillery, probably still inferior, however, as to fire control.

To move ahead of the Soviet Union in light weapons and artillery, the United States has developed an improved light arms family and an excellent new series of self-propelled aluminum-light mounts for its artillery.

The new M–14 rifle and M–60 machinegun are in limited production only. There is no production money at all for the new artillery mounts or automatic rifle. It will take 6½ years to fill initial Regular Army needs alone for the M–14 rifle under current production.

There are bright spots in the U.S. Army weapon picture. Concentrating its money on the newer weapons, the United States probably is technically ahead in battlefield missiles such as the good Lacrosse, but the Soviet Union has more such missiles and more of them on mobile mounts. With the Hawk, the United States is technically ahead in protection against low-flying planes. The Soviets rely on large numbers of new rapid-firing guns. In armored troop carriers, the United States has better but fewer weapons.

RUSSIAN GAINS IN AIR

The picture in the air, as far as conventional forces are concerned, is equally if not more dismal.

In tactical air, the Soviet Union has built far more fighters, better adapted to rough fields, than the United States has built of its more sophisticated craft. Russia is exporting them.

In airlift, the Russians are bringing in much bigger helicopters, big global T–114 turboprop transports and other craft while the United States is concentrating on plush jet airlines for the commercial trade.

CONVENTIONAL FORCES

In a look at the rival Soviet and American conventional forces, this is apparent:

The Soviets have modernized the Red Army and its tactical air force all along the line, avoiding the American concentration on perhaps more exotic new weapons, like missiles, recoilless rifles, and battlefield radar "seeing eyes," while letting lag basic improvements in tanks, artillery and other conventional arms.

The result is an ever increasing disparity in conventional forces—and in an age in which the psychological bar against the first use of nuclear weapons is growing, not diminishing.

The Soviet motto seems to have been well put by one Russian officer who reportedly declared: "There is too much at stake—the future of communism—to economize on the Red army."

U.S. IMAGE ABROAD—WE CAN STILL RIGHT UNHAPPY BALANCE

(By Chalmers M. Roberts)

A nation's ability to influence the course of world affairs, even its ability to survive, is dependent both on the reality of power and on the public image others have of that power.

The first three articles in this series have pointed out a central feature of the Eisenhower years—the massive decline in U.S. military power and the para-military power of space science in relation to the rising military power of the Soviet Union.

Shifts in the military power balance are inevitable and have occurred throughout history as capable men in one nation or another have produced new weapons or other elements of force. The power pendulum swings back and forth.

On the basis of the evidence in the preceding articles there is no reason to believe that the United States cannot right the balance, not to the extent of the early post-World War II years in which it enjoyed a nuclear monopoly, but at least to the extent of creating both an adequate massive deterrent and a flexible conventional warfare capability.

SKILL NOT LACKING

It is evident enough that it is not technical skill that is lacking in the United States to do these things.

The problem in Washington is one of attitude. It is an attitude which attempts to comfort those at home who are alarmed at the military slippage by talking about "balanced forces" and about not competing with the Russians missile for missile.

It is an attitude toward the other free nations of the world which the United States professes to lead in the East-West struggle, an attitude in which budget balancing and the sanctity of the dollar appear supreme.

It is an attitude of annoyance on the part of President Eisenhower as expressed in answer to a press conference question about a Soviet claim of ability to hit any point in the world, precisely and accurately, with an ICBM having an H-bomb warhead.

"They also said," he snapped, "that they invented the flying machine and the automobile and other things. Why should you be so respectful of this statement this morning, if you are not so respectful of the other three?"

It is an attitude which often still seems not to have comprehended the meaning of the first Soviet sputnik.

Millions of words have been written about the totality of Communist efforts, embracing not only military but psychological, economic and political tactics in the East-West struggle. Yet the night that first sputnik soared around the earth, one of the then military service Secretaries confessed that in earlier intra-administration arguments over American plans for a satellite he had said that he never had heard of any more damned foolish idea. The night of Sputnik I he expressed total amazement at world interest in the accomplishment.

PRESIDENT'S COMMENT

As recently as last November, during the shilly-shallying over military or civilian control of space work, the President could comment that "for the life of me, I cannot see any reason why we should be using or misusing military talent to explore the moon."

Most important, the attitude in Washington has created an image around the world of a United States fast declining in military power and space science—and therefore in diplomatic power with which to enforce its will and its hopes and expectations.

In such a context it is no wonder that much of the world believes Nikita S. Khrushchev won his invitation to the United States by nuclear blackmailing this Nation over Berlin. All the talk from Washington about the invitation being part of a new Eisenhower peace offensive cannot counter such an interpretation.

The simple fact is that much of the world now believes Khrushchev's talk about military superiority. All the Pentagon releases piled as high as the Washington Monument and all the fine words from the White House will not rub out the impression that this administration has accepted a second-best military-space status for the United States.

What so often counts is not only the facts but what people think are the facts.

AMERICANS UNEASY

That Americans are uneasy, in many cases downright alarmed, about the state of the Nation's military defenses is evident. That there is an uneasy stir in the land is also true.

The United States today is powerfully armed. If war should come tomorrow, America's Armed Forces doubtless would give an excellent account of themselves. Much fine work is being done by various arms of the administration to improve the defense posture. Many, many men work beyond the call of duty to help protect and defend the Nation.

Still, the image of America is not a happy one. The President, by his recent three-continent tour and by his other often eloquent statements about the American desire for peace, has done much to counter the Communist-inspired picture of a warmongering United States.

But that is only part of the solution. The other part is to create a reality and a consequent worldwide image of strength on which American diplomats can count when they meet the Communists across the conference tables. This requires both more military preparedness and a greater leap into the age of space.

The administration's proposals for the final Eisenhower year are about to be made public. From what is known in advance they will not substantially alter the present pace in either field. Perhaps the Congress can do something additional but in an election year there is likely to be more sound and fury than action.

The result, as many public officials both in and out of the administration are saying today, is that the President who enters the White House a year and 2 weeks from today will face tasks of heroic proportions. Hence the choice of that man by the voters this November 8 will be supremely important for the United States and the free world.

CRITICISM OF SETTLEMENT OF THE STEEL STRIKE

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, lest it be thought that the settlement of the steel strike was unanimously approved, I wish to raise one small voice in dissent.

This is by no means the first time in this administration that the high phrases and principles enunciated by the Chief Executive have finally resolved themselves, when it came to the practicalities, into something considerably lower.

In his column of January 5, Walter Lippmann characterized the settlement as "a political fix." I am very glad to be able to quote this eminent journalist, who is a master of English prose, rather than try to find descriptive words from my own more limited vocabulary.

It will be recalled that the President repeatedly and emphatically denounced any possible settlement which would result in price increases or would be inflationary. Yet there is not the slightest assurance that this settlement will meet the President's specification. On the contrary, the only speculation is when the increases will occur. There seems to be some tentative arrangement, based upon the fact that the wage increases will not become effective until December 1, that noticeable price increases may not occur until about that time, or, perhaps, after the second Tuesday in November—a date to remember for other reasons.

The very reliable Wall Street Journal said, on January 5, that there is an unwritten understanding with Vice President NIXON and Labor Secretary Mitchell that the companies will forgo any general price increase for several months, possibly through 1960. But I hazard a prediction that the anxiety of the steel companies to maintain their honored tradition of continuous and unremitting price increases, with or without excuse, will overcome their not quite equal anxiety to contribute to the welfare of the Republican Party and its candidate. There are about as many ways to increase steel prices as there are to skin a cat, and some of these can be used without equivalent outcry. I predict "adjustments" and "definitions" and "reclassifications" of the multitudinous steel products. As the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], has pointed out, steel prices were increased to the small buyer even before the strike, by changing the method of computing quantity discounts.

If one believes, even to the slightest degree, the claims made by steel company executives during the long negotiations, postponement of price increases after this settlement would represent a great sacrifice. This, if it occurs, ought to be classified, under the Corrupt Practices Act, as a campaign contribution to the Republican Party. But in the long run, the $1 billion estimated cost of the settlement will surely be paid by the general public, in the form of increased prices throughout the economy, with something extra added for the steel companies.

Another high-sounding principle of the President which was swept under the rug was his determination to rely on free collective bargaining. If anyone believes that this settlement was achieved by any such means, he ought to be disillusioned. The settlement was achieved by political maneuvering. Spokesmen of one party, controlling the executive branch, threatened negotiators with what another party, controlling the Congress, might do. Another bitter fruit of divided government.

Another great problem swept under the rug is that of providing adequate machinery for dealing with such strikes. What of all the agonizing about the deficiencies in our labor-management laws to handle such paralyzing conflicts? It has gone by the board, perhaps all too soon to return again when the national economy is next brought to its knees by another such combination of labor-management power.

What about our competitive position in world trade, the concern of the administration over our imbalance of payments, the crucial problem which impels us to impose Buy American policies on our development assistance program, the concern which impels us to increase interest rates to prevent gold and dollar outflow? How is this great problem ameliorated by the steel settlement? There was already concern that in some industries we were pricing ourselves out of world markets; and although there was undue concern about our balance of payments, the one industry most vulnerable was the steel industry.

In November 1959, the Commerce Department published an analysis of changes in U.S. shares of export markets for manufacturers, 1954–1958. I emphasize that it was an analysis of percentage shares of individual regional markets for exports, rather than dollar amounts of exports, so that the study reflected U.S. exports in terms of aggregate world trade. The study determined that the overall U.S. share had indeed been reduced, but that the supposition of general decline was unsupported. The general decline was explained by serious losses centered in a few items—most notably motor vehicles and steel.

In the same period, 1954–58, steel imports doubled. Automobile imports increased several times over.

Last year the steel companies asked for tariff increases on steel wire, and were turned down. It will be interesting to see what new tariff protection they ask, and what they receive, again at the expense of the consumer.

Inexorably, in spite of increased steel ingot capacity of 26 percent between 1953 and 1958, and in spite of increased efficiency, the price of steel moved upward: $3 a ton in 1954, $7.35 a ton in 1955, $8.50 a ton in 1956, $6 a ton in 1957, $4.50 a ton in 1958—during the recession. Prices of finished steel rose 34.1 percent between 1953 and 1958, as against 8.3 percent for all commodities.

Upward moved profits—from $9.07 per ton in 1953 to $17.46 per ton in the first half of 1959.

Labor's wages went up from a minimum of $1.57 in 1954 to $2.03 in the Nixon settlement, not including cost-of-living increases of 17 cents an hour.

All this, the increased wages and the increased profits, came out of the pockets of the general public, in the form of higher costs.

There was an opportunity for statesmanship in the steel strike. Industry could have resisted further wage costs with a promise to reduce its exorbitant prices and profits. Our capitalistic system is rationalized, at least in part, upon the theory that the consumer shares the benefits of increased labor productivity and capital investment in the form of more and better goods at lower costs. But instead, we have a triumph of political expediency over statesmanship. The beneficiaries are big labor, which gets a substantial wage increase, big business, which undoubtedly will receive higher prices, and the Republican Party, which will enjoy the political fruits—all of these at the expense of the unsuspecting public.

Let me close with a quotation from the President's state of the Union message on inflation:

> We must prevent inflation * * * to prevent steadily rising costs and prices calls for stern self-discipline by every citizen. No person, city, State, or organized groups can afford to evade the obligation to resist inflation, for every American pays its crippling tax.

Mr. President, there have been many searching criticisms of this strike settlement. Among these are two columns by Arthur Krock, the distinguished scholar and writer of the New York Times.

I ask unanimous consent that two columns, one of January 6 and one of January 7, 1960, be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

In order to complete the data, I also ask unanimous consent that a table of wage increases and two articles, one by Peter Edson and one by Walter Lippmann, appearing in the Washington Post of January 7, be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TO MR. TRUMAN IT MUST SEEM LIKE YESTERDAY

(By Arthur Krock)

WASHINGTON, January 6.—Since neither the Eisenhower administration nor a visible majority of Congress is prepared to challenge the basic monopoly power of an industry-wide trade union, it is obvious that any Government-impelled strike settlement accepted by industry and labor must inevitably be a capitulation to most of the striking union's demands. Therefore, if the judgment is sound that the steel-strike settlement longer deferred would have been even more costly for the industry, then the compliments for their successful intervention now being lavished on Vice President NIXON and Secretary of Labor Mitchell are merited chiefly on the consideration that "it might have been worse."

But if and when the new inflationary prod of the settlement is registered in subsequent labor contracts and in the higher price level usually incident to increases in the cost of steel, American consumers may see more plainly that they are being constantly exploited by the politicians and the labor leaders who combine to maintain the laws by which big unions control the labor supply of nationwide industry. And so long as this power, which no other economic group possesses, continues to have the sanction of law, settlements of nationwide strikes will always be political and prounion.

This fact has often been demonstrated since organized labor was uniquely exempted from the antitrust laws. But apparently the population at large, which is the victim of this arrangement, doesn't know how to engender the pressure on both major parties that would produce an equitable system. Or the American people require the shock of currency inflation of the postwar European disaster type and the rising unemployment that would be the consequence of successful foreign competition in the world markets before they will move effectively to protect themselves from the alliance of politics and big labor.

The impotence of the unorganized conmers against this combination has been promoted by its bipartisan nature. This Republican administration has been as one with its Democratic predecessor in declining to attack the root of the union labor monopoly—the immunity from the antitrust laws by which the steelworkers, for example, were able to shut down a nationwide industry by withdrawing its labor force. No sooner had their strike settlement been reached when Secretary Mitchell announced the administration would seek no new power over strikes that paralyze the economy. And this is the second time (the first occasion was in 1956) in President Eisenhower's tenure that Government pressure has been applied to the steel industry for capitulation to the union.

"In the current settlement," commented Iron Age, "the union won about everything it wanted except a complete carbon copy of the 1956 package. * * * The steel firms * * * settled for about one-half that cost. * * * [Hence], if there is a price increase, as expected, it will be a moderate one. * * * The thing that hurts most is that twice Government pressure has come from a strong [sic] Republican administration. And most painful of all: the steel industry could have had a cheaper settlement last July when Mr. NIXON offered to lend a helping hand to both sides."

The Vice President has this justification to cite for the compliments he is receiving. And also according to Iron Age, NIXON's first effort to settle the strike early last July only missed by an eyelash. But the odds against the industry were insuperable: the union's legalized control of its labor supply, subject only to the temporary restraint of a Taft-Hartley injunction; and the prospect, which finally materialized, that the administration would follow the pattern of intervention, bound in existing circumstances to be pro-union, which the Republicans assailed President Truman for applying.

Suppose, after a long abstinence from effective action and instead of intervening himself, Mr. Truman had turned the job over to his political heir-apparent and to a Cabinet member who wanted to be Vice President. And suppose, after these officials had ended a strike, the latter had immediately announced the administration would abandon all its huffing and puffing about new laws to strengthen public power to sustain the economy. Republican shouts of a political deal would have shaken the heavens.

What's the big difference?

THE STATE OF THE UNION AND GEORGE MEANY

(By Arthur Krock)

WASHINGTON, January 7.—President Eisenhower in his constitutional message to Congress today verified the prediction of Secretary of Labor Mitchell that, with the steel strike settled, the administration would propose no new legislation in the labor-management field. According to some behind-the-scenes workers in the steel dispute, the President's omission of any such legislative recommendations also verified a provisional forecast to this same effect conveyed by Vice President NIXON and Secretary Mitchell to the companies and the union—the proviso being that these principals would agree on terms.

But even more significant was the fact that President Eisenhower's substitute for legislation was approximately the proposal formally made to him in November by President George Meany of the AFL–CIO. This proposal was that, prior to the development of nationwide labor disputes into a strike status, there should be periodic joint management-union talks "under White House auspices * * * to develop guiding lines for joint and harmonious labor-management relations." And President Eisenhower today adopted it as his entire 1960 labor program in the following words:

"One of the lessons [of the steel strike] is that the potential danger to the entire Nation of longer and greater strikes must be met. To insure against such possibilities we must, of course, depend primarily on the good commonsense of the responsibile individuals. It is my intention to encourage regular discussions between management and labor outside the bargaining table, to consider the interest of the public as well as their mutual interest in the maintenance of industrial peace, price stability, and economic growth."

This formula, if it can be called that, leaves totally undisturbed the legalized power of a nationwide union to paralyze the economy indefinitely by withdrawing the entire labor force of a nationwide essential industry. It continues to leave the Government with only the ineffective device of an 80-day Taft-Hartley interruption of such strikes, after which the union may again withdraw the entire labor force. And it maintains union domination of the so-called collective-bargaining table inherent in this monopoly of the labor market, a domination which generally compels an acceptance by industry of most of a union's demands when Government stands aloof, and always when Government intervenes.

Nevertheless, a Republican President has accepted the AFL–CIO position that the industrywide strike problem be left wholly to the workings of the good will, the good commonsense, self-discipline and responsibility of the parties, although these factors have been conspicuously absent in past disputes between big labor and big business. And, when one party has a power monopoly denied to the other by law, it is quite confiding of the President to base labor policy on the hope that the first will cease exploiting this power to the utmost when it passes under the lintel of the White House.

But that was the arrangement on which the steel union was induced, and the industry was compelled by Government to agree on terms that, the President remarked comfortably, percentagewise were "lower than any prior settlement since World War II." And, since the only Democratic criticism is that the union might have taken less if the administration had wielded its club and offered its sugar earlier, the people have no political recourse.

The claim of the AFL–CIO to the origin of the administration's new labor policy is thoroughly established in the record. At the University of Wisconsin, November 1958, its general counsel, Arthur J. Goldberg, proposed "a labor-management assembly, modeled after the United Nations * * *, as an instrument for bringing together (under the auspices of the Government) the leading figures in American industry and the leading figures in the American trade union movement for a periodic examination and discussion of the issues which affect us all and in which we find so little common ground."

Secretary Mitchell was viewed as blowing cold on this at the time. But when Meany formally laid the plan before President Eisenhower a year later, the President made it unanimous by answering that this was just what Mitchell "repeatedly had called for."

STEEL PRICES AND WAGES

PITTSBURGH, January 4.—Here is a table showing the increases in steelworkers wages and steel prices at the dates of successive contracts since the Steel Workers Organizing Committee—now the United Steelworkers of America—negotiated its first contract in 1937:

Year	Strike length	Minimum pay	Hourly increase	Steel price increase per ton
	Days
1937		$0.625	$0.10
1941		.725	.10	$11.00
1942		.78	.055
1946	26	.965	.185	5.00
1947		1.09	[1] 1.16	5.00
1948		1.185	[1] 1.13	9.34
1950		1.36	[1] 1.16	5.50
1952	59	1.435	[1] 1.16	5.00
1953		1.52	.085	4.00

1958		1.96	.07	4.50
1959	[3] 116

[1] Denotes hourly increase which was included in "package" spread over the various job classifications, and not exactly matched in the minimum pay rates.

[2] Hours.

[3] The strike lasted from July 15 until Nov. 7, 1959, when workers returned to the mills under a Taft-Hartley injunction. But the labor settlement was not reached until Jan. 4, 1960.

[4] Includes reported but unannounced wage increase of 7 cents an hour effective Dec. 1, 1960.

Minimum pay and hourly increase figures do not include a total of 17 cents an hour that workers received between 1956 and 1959 in cost-of-living increases under the last contract signed in 1956. The cost-of-living increases brought the 1958 base pay to $2.13 an hour.

The composite price of steel was estimated at $160 a ton last June.

STEEL UNION REAL VICTOR

(By Peter Edson)

All the cheering over Vice President NIXON's and Secretary of Labor James P. Mitchell's "great victory" in settling the steel strike drowns out and is in complete contradiction to what President Eisenhower said all last year about the dangers of inflation it involved.

Close study of the contract terms as finally announced shows that the real victor was United Steel Workers Union.

But the steel companies didn't do so badly in the deal either. For they are now completely free to raise prices as much as the traffic will bear—with Government blessing.

This is the one thing they lacked—up to the final week

Steel management in the past has always been free to raise prices to cover wage increases—and then some. So what you have is big business and big labor as usual, without change.

As far back as last May—before the strike—President Eisenhower was telling his press conferences: "I would again insist that the whole 175 million of us ought to make clear that we are concerned about this matter and this is not something where we are standing aside and seeing ourselves hurt."

He said this repeatedly but it did no good.

After the strike and the injunction which sent the steelmakers back to work, in his nationwide broadcast December 3, before leaving on his 3-week mission to 11 foreign countries, the President called for around-the-clock bargaining to see that the public interest is as carefully protected as the interests of stockholders and employees.

There wasn't and it wasn't.

In his press conference the day before, the President had declared that "I do believe that the day we abandon free and collective bargaining, it is going to be a sad day for the United States."

A case can be made that free collective bargaining was abandoned when Vice President NIXON and Secretary Mitchell intervened—with obvious White House approval. So this must be a sad day for the United States. While they did not dictate the terms of settlement, they created the atmosphere which made settlement possible.

Management and labor were scared into settlement by fear of what Congress might do if they didn't agree. What they came up with was a face-saving formula that may have the delayed-action effect of an inflationary time bomb.

Management originally proposed a 1-year wage freeze. It got what appears on the surface to be an 11-month freeze—no outright wage increase until December 30, 1960.

But company assumption of all health and welfare costs gives the employees the equivalent of an immediate 6 cents an hour increase in take-home. So there's no freeze.

Labor asked for a 15-cent-an-hour increase in each year of a 3-year contract. It settled for 7 cents an hour and up increase in each of the last 2 years. So the total take-home increase is 20, instead of 45 cents.

This again looks good on the surface. But when the fringe benefits are included, it looks different. The union turned down management's original offer of a 24- to 30-cent an hour package increase. It got a 39- to 41-cent package.

So no matter how you slice it, it still looks inflationary. The bad news will come later. For almost every steel industry source now concedes prices will have to go up.

INGLORIOUS ENDING

(By Walter Lippmann)

The steel strike has been called off in a way which leaves the public without any means of determining whether the result is just or unjust, wise or unwise. It is evident that the companies lost the strike. But there does not exist any impartial and dependable report on the issues which enables anyone from the President down to know whether the companies have conceded more than they could afford to concede. For the President has steadfastly refused to countenance official factfinding as the basis for a settlement. As a result, no one really knows what the Nixon-Mitchell settlement means.

The President, so he said last July, has been acting on the notion that there must be no Government intervention because "we have got thoroughly to test out and use the method of free bargaining." We have now had the test. What happened in the test? What happened was that the Government intervened in the person of the Vice President. He used the carrot for the union and the stick for the companies. He coerced the companies into yielding not all but most of what the union was fighting for. Moreover, it would appear, he induced them to agree that they will not raise steel prices until after the election. The strike was not settled by free bargaining. It was settled by a political fix.

The President, whose mind has no doubt been on other things, seems never to have realized that in this struggle the process of free bargaining was exhausted very early in the day—almost certainly by July when the strike actually began. It was evident from the beginning that the two great monopolies were committed to a test of power, not to a process of bargaining. The test was which of them could hold out the longer against the other.

In July when the strike began there were reasons for thinking that the companies were the stronger. Their customers had large stockpiles. Labor unions were unpopular as a result of the McClellan exposures. The public was opposed to another round of wage-price increases. And there was some question whether Mr. McDonald was in solid control of his union. But as time went on the balance of power began to favor the union chiefly because, I imagine, it was increasingly evident that if Congress had to intervene to settle the strike, it would not be very tender with the companies. It is significant that the Nixon-Mitchell intervention succeeded because they were able to threaten the companies with the certainty of congressional action.

So we have come to a crude and embarrassing ending to an inglorious and mismanaged policy. I have reason to know that it is denied in official quarters that the strike could have been settled any earlier. But I think it is arguable from the record that a settlement on the Nixon-Mitchell terms could have been had at any time. All that was required was to give labor the carrot of the concessions and then to do to the companies what Mr. NIXON did to them, to use the big stick of a threat of special legislation in Congress leading to some kind of compulsory arbitration.

If the President had realized that the period of free bargaining had ended even before the strike began, the threatened strike could have been handled by measures which were rational, which protected the public interest, and enlightened public opinion. By July there should have been an official factfinding report on the issues and official recommendations for the settlement. When that report had been debated, and a predominant public opinion had been formed about it, the next step would have been to enforce the findings by calling on Congress to grant the power to do so.

Presumably, it would not have been necessary to go so far as to call Congress into special session or to use the powers if Congress were called and the powers were granted. The Nixon-Mitchell deal shows that the threat to do all these things would probably have been sufficient.

In acting in this fashion the administration would have stood on the solid basis of an impartial report, and this report would have had to deal with the crucial question that Mr. NIXON has left up in the air. This question is whether or not the concessions to labor are inflationary in that they justify and require a rise in steel prices. If the report had found that the concessions were inflationary but that some smaller concessions would not be, the union would have been forced by the threat of compulsory arbitration to accept the lower terms.

All in all, we can be glad that the strike is not to be resumed. But there is nothing else to be glad about.

ESTABLISHMENT OF WISCONSIN NATIONAL MORAINE PARK—RESOLUTION OF WISCONSIN DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, the preservation of our natural heritage—particularly the areas of historical, scientific, biological, and scenic significance—is a continuous challenge before the country.

Our increasing population, growth of industry, mushrooming of cities—all of these make ever-greater demands on our resources, and threaten to wipe out the remaining vestiges of our natural out-of-doors.

Consequently, it is essential that, wherever possible, efforts be made to prevent unnecessary deterioration of such lands, particularly when they contain topographical features of particular significance.

In Wisconsin, for example, we have a moraine area approximately 500 miles long which contains unique, glacial-produced formations.

Recognizing the historical significance of these features, the State of Wisconsin has established the Kettle Moraine State Park.

Because of the overall importance of the area, however, the inclusion of more of the moraine area into a national park now seems advisable.

To accomplish this, I have introduced a bill, S. 894, to establish an Ice Age National Park.

I am happy to point out that the proposal has received broad-scope support from a great many of our citizens and organizations in the State. Among these has been the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, Department of Wisconsin. Not long ago the department adjutant-quartermaster, Edward J. Schmidt, forwarded a resolution adopted by the VFW, urging enactment of the legislation to establish a national park. As an example of the wide support for the proposal, I request unanimous consent to have the resolution by the VFW printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution supporting establishment of Wisconsin Moraine National Park

Whereas a bill has been introduced in the 86th Congress of the United States calling for the creation of a national park in Wisconsin from the meandering glacial moraines located in some 26 counties of the State, the nucleus of this area being the Kettle Moraine State Park; and

Whereas the last of the four great glaciers was called the Wisconsin Glacier because in no other place in America did the glacier leave clearer evidence of its existence; and

Whereas this natural feature of our State should be perpetuated in the form of a national park; and

Whereas Wisconsin does not have a national park; and it is proposed to create the Ice Age National Park from this area; and

Whereas this moraine area has no economic value because of the very thin topsoil and underlying gravel, but is ideal for recreational purposes, such as skiing, hiking, camping, and so forth; and

Whereas as this proposed park, 500 miles long, about one-fourth mile wide, and totaling 125 square miles or 70,000 acres, will enhance the recreational, scenic, and business aspects of this state; and create parkways, waysides, trails and shelters across Wisconsin; and

Whereas it is well established that recreation areas must be set aside now to take care of the needs of our increasing population: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, by the Department of Wisconsin, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, duly assembled at its 38th annual convention at Wausau, Wis., during the period June 24–27, 1959, that we go on record to enthusiastically support the Ice Age National Park proposal, that we urge all posts and auxiliaries to write to their respective representatives in Congress expressing support of such a national park in Wisconsin, and that a copy of this resolution be sent to Senators ALEXANDER WILEY and WILLIAM PROXMIRE, and to all Wisconsin Congressmen.

Adopted at the department convention, VFW, at Wausau, Wis., June 24–27, 1959.

SERMON BY MOST REV. LEO F. DWORSCHAK AT FUNERAL OF LATE SENATOR LANGER, OF NORTH DAKOTA

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. President, the sermon delivered by the Most Reverend Leo F. Dworschak, auxiliary bishop of Fargo, at the funeral of our late and esteemed colleague, Senator William Langer, was one of the most powerful and soul searching I have ever heard. It is a sermon which I am sure every Member of the Senate would like to read. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the body of the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the sermon was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SERMON AT THE FUNERAL OF THE HONORABLE WILLIAM LANGER, ST. LEO'S CHURCH, CASSELTON, N. DAK., NOVEMBER 14, 1959, BY THE MOST REVEREND LEO F. DWORSCHAK, AUXILIARY BISHOP OF FARGO

Bereaved mourners and kind friends, in this solemn hour we have offered the holy sacrifice of the Mass for a Christian soul. It is here that the democracy of the church is made manifest. She performs this same rite for all her children as they pass from time to eternity, from this world to the unending hereafter. For poor and rich alike, for the famous and the obscure, her prayer is the same, her essential offering is the same. For in death, which has been described as the great leveler, we are all one in our need.

We have offered the holy sacrifice for William Langer. Beyond that it actually is of little moment now to his soul that we should speak at any length in praise or blame of his character and his life's achievement. In the end death came to him quite suddenly. But it did not find him unprepared. After the passing of his beloved wife he seemed to have a premonition that his own step into eternity would also have to be made soon. He strengthened himself spiritually by receiving the sacraments of the church, and in correspondence with the pastor of this parish as recently as October 30 made it plain that the consolations of his religion gave him the strength to face the prospect of meeting his Creator soon without hesitation and without fear. Hence he now stands in no need of the praise of men. If he has gained for himself God's praise, he needs no other.

And yet, before the last blessing of the church is performed over his mortal remains, we will do well to pause a moment and dwell on just one thought suggested by his career. In my opinion, the most striking facet of his character as a public servant was his unshakable adherence to his convictions. There were times when he stood almost alone on an issue and no consideration of practical politics nor pressure from others could induce him to recede from the stand he had taken or to compromise what he considered just and right. I did not always share his convictions; but he did have positive convictions and steadfastly refused to compromise them for reasons of political expediency or personal gain. In an age when expediency rather than principle is so often made the supreme law of statesmanship, business practice, and personal conduct, it is a refreshing experience to see an example of unshakable faithfulness to conviction and loyalty to the truth as he saw it.

We are reminded of the scene described in the 18th chapter of St. John's Gospel. Jesus stands before Pilate to be judged by him. The Roman governor seeks desperately to extricate himself from an awkward position by questioning the accused in an effort to wring from Him some admission that would justify either a sentence of death or an acquittal—anything to get off a bad spot.

The subject of kingship is mentioned, and Pilate eagerly follows it up with the question, "Then You are a King after all?" Jesus replies, "You are right. I am a King. For this purpose I was born, and for this purpose I came into the world—to give testimony to the truth. Only he who is open to the truth gives ear to My voice." With a sneer, Pilate says to Him, "What is truth?" and returns to the balcony to face the multitude.

There is an undertone of tragedy in Pilate's question. Here he was in the presence of Him who had said: "I am the way; I am truth and life." (John 14: 6.) For a brief moment he had a brush with immortality. But he turned away; he was not open to the truth. He was not at fault for having asked the question. He was at fault because he refused to wait for an answer. In our generation a growing number of people go a step farther. They say there is no answer.

That viewpoint was spelled out quite clearly and concisely in June of 1951 by the late Chief Justice Vinson. "Nothing," he wrote, "is more certain in modern society than the principle that there are no absolutes, that a name, a phrase, a standard has meaning only when associated with the circumstances which gave birth to the nomenclature. To those who would paralyze our Government in the face of impending danger by encasing it in a semantic straitjacket we must reply that all concepts are relative."

These words were a part of the decision in which the Supreme Court upheld the conviction of 11 top-flight Communists. If the principle enunciated by Mr. Vinson in those two sentences were universally adopted and carried to its logical conclusion by the people and the Government of the United States, it would, in my opinion, do more harm to this Nation than all the activities of all the Communists on either side of the Iron Curtain. Deny the possibility of absolute truth and absolute values and you destroy the basis, not only of our Government but of our very nature as free beings.

Our Founding Fathers established this Nation upon the principle that certain absolute and self-evident truths are the foundation upon which our right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness rests. If human language can have any meaning at all, the Declaration of Independence means just that. If there are no absolute truths or values, there can be no justice and we can have no inalienable rights. A nation is powerful and its citizens are truly free in the degree in which they possess and are loyal to the truth. That is what Our Lord meant when He said: "If you make my teaching your rule of life, you are truly my disciples; then you will know the truth and the truth will make you free." (John 4: 31–32)

Denial of the truth or the possibility of discovering it goes contrary to every instinct of our nature. In the last analysis truth is reality. It simply is fact. And facts are absolute. When a fine china teacup falls off the table and is shattered, that is a fact. You could conceivably mend it; but you could not change the fact that it had been broken. No process of reasoning or sophistry can change or nullify objective truth or fact. It makes no difference whether the truth pertains to the physical, intellectual, or spiritual realm. In every case truth is reality. Truth is divine because truth is the essence of God's nature.

There is something rigidly inflexible about truth. Let us say that a hostess sets the table for dinner. She arranges two places on each side. No matter how loudly she may protest that there are no absolutes, she will not be able to seat five guests so long as she has only two places on each side of the table. If she wants to seat the fifth guest she must bring up another chair. That is the force of logic and the tyranny of truth. It is basically as simple as that. Such an objective and immutable quality is found in every truth, be it scientific, ethical, or theological.

There are timid souls—and in this respect our generation is becoming more timid by the hour—there are timid souls who fear the truth precisely because objective truth is rigid, unchangeable, eternal. They fear that adherence to truth implies a degrading slavery or subjection which destroys our dignity as free, intelligent beings. To them subjection of any kind is an insult to our hope of being our own masters. Nothing could be farther from the truth.

It is true, of course, that many men are slaves. Probably many more today than in ages past. Some are slaves because they are victims of brute force; but more are slaves because they are victims of their own cowardice or selfish desire for security. A slave, in Aristotle's definition, is a man whose choices are made for him by others. He may even enjoy comfort and security beyond a free man's wildest dreams, like the slave of a wealthy merchant in ancient Athens. But he is a slave nonetheless because his choices are forced upon him by a cruel master or by the tyranny of circumstances.

But there are forms of subjection which are not degrading, a subjection which is the fulfillment of our dignity as man. There is the subjection of a creature to his God, of citizen to valid authority in the state, of child to parent. Those are forms of subjection which nature itself demands in the hierarchy of values for the perfection of the human individual. The most perfect, the noblest of all human beings in the end will be he who was most completely subject to God, he whose life was most nearly in conformity with the divine will of the Creator.

In matters of truth, the mind which is more subject to reality is the more perfect mind, the more accurate interpreter of objective reality. Surely we are not degrading the dignity of the child when we teach him the inflexible logic of the multiplication tables. We are not degraded by the law of gravity, even though he suffers injury who tries to ignore it.

Neither do we do violence to the hopes and aspirations of a free man if we insist that he conduct himself according to the moral law implanted in him by the Creator. The laws of physics, of logic, of ethics—each is an element which the Creator used in weaving the fabric of what we call human dignity. The pattern of conduct proposed to man in the divine plan may be likened to a road map. When we are on a journey the map guides us to our destination. It does not shackle our freedom.

In one sense truth may be tyranny. It is eternal and immutable, and as such places some limits on our freedom of action. But these are rational limits which spring from our nature as intelligent beings. To defy those limits is to invite disaster. Dostoyevsky summed it up perfectly when he said: "To begin with, unlimited freedom is to end with unlimited despotism."

One of the most tragic episodes in the Korean war was the treasonable conduct of some of our men who had been taken captive by the Red army. These men were spoken of with derision by a large sector of the American people. But such condemnation was unfair to them. Their conduct was not so much a crime on their part as an indictment of the society which failed to impart to them an understanding of objective truth and laws of morality, and instill in them unshakable convictions regarding the foundations upon which our democratic society rests. If there is no such thing as objective truth, if there are no absolute moral values why should a man refuse to compromise the principles of justice and decency in face of death by torture or starvation. In such circumstances no man can remain strong without the support of firm convictions. In fact, such support is necessary for every man whether soldier or statesman, politician or captain of industry, farmer or day laborer.

Hence if there is any thought that the life and career of William Langer would inspire in us, it is the importance of loyalty to our convictions. There may be other roads to wealth or fame or pleasure. There is no other road to happiness and freedom. With that thought we sum up our tribute to the memory of William Langer.

To you, members of his family and his official household, who knew him best and therefore loved him best, we extend our sympathy in this hour of bitter pain. May yours be the comfort of all good Christians who trust in the everlasting mercy, and through your tears look meekly up to Christ, the God of all consolation.

William Langer will long be remembered by us, and never forgotten by Holy Mother Church. Until time shall be no more she will number him among those countless souls for whom she prays unceasingly: "Eternal rest grant unto them, O Lord, and let perpetual light shine upon them. May his soul and the souls of all the faithful departed through the mercy of God rest in peace. Amen."

STEPS TAKEN BY SECRETARY OF DEFENSE GATES TO PREVENT INTERSERVICE DISPUTES

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I wish to bring to the attention of the Senate an article which appeared in last Thursday's New York Times describing the steps taken by Secretary of Defense Tom Gates to head off interservice disputes.

Mr. Gates has announced his intention to participate actively in the decisions of the Joint Chiefs of Staff whenever there is in fact, or appears to be imminent, a disagreement among the heads of the military services as to a matter of their joint policy.

Secretary Gates' plan should be widely acclaimed. It has been recommended for many years by leading authorities in the field of military organization. It is a direct, concrete step toward greater civilian control of our Military Establishment, and will bring our Nation's chief defense policymaker into the important daily decisions of our military chiefs.

Knowing Mr. Gates well, I can say to the Senate that his decision will undoubtedly go a long way toward resolving some of the time-consuming, bitter, and wasteful interservice quarreling which has marred our defense organization in the past. Because of Mr. Gates' familiarity with the problems of the military services and because of his long experience in the Defense Department, and his keen understanding of our Nation's defense needs, his personal contributions with the Joint Chiefs of Staff will, I know, add much to our military decision-making process and will further insure the formulation of sound policies for our Nation's security.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that two news articles on the subject be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GATES ACTS TO NIP POLICY DISPUTES OF JOINT CHIEFS—DEMANDS THAT DIFFERENCES BE REPORTED SO HE CAN SIT IN ON SESSIONS

(By Jack Raymond)

WASHINGTON, January 6—Secretary of Defense Thomas S. Gates, Jr., announced plans today to intervene swiftly when the Joint Chiefs of Staff failed to agree on military matters.

The Defense Secretary disclosed that he had issued a memorandum to the chiefs demanding that he be informed as soon as there was an inkling of policy differences among them.

He said he would sit with the chiefs in formal session, rather than wait for them to present their differences to him through the chairman.

If necessary, he continued, he will quickly advise President Eisenhower whenever the chiefs are unable to resolve their disputes, as has often happened.

RETURNS FROM MEETING

Secretary Gates referred to the new piece of paper upon his return from a 2-day meeting at Atlantic Fleet headquarters, Norfolk, Va., with the chiefs, the service secretaries, and field commanders from all over the world.

He shrugged off most efforts to elicit comment on criticisms of the United States defense readiness. But when asked about one of these criticisms made in New York today by Gen. Maxwell D. Taylor, retired Army Chief of Staff, the Secretary snapped:

"I guess I am not as wise as General Taylor."

The specific charge that prompted Secretary Gates' acid rejoinder was that the Soviet Union was 2 years ahead of the United States in long-range ballistic missiles.

There were other demands today for the strengthening of U.S. defenses, indicating a point of major interest for Congress this session. Senator PRESCOTT BUSH, Republican, of Connecticut, who is a member of the Armed Service Committee, said this country's defenses must be "impregnable" until "an effective, controlled disarmament is negotiated."

PROPOSED BUDGET CRITICIZED

Senator THOMAS J. DODD, Democrat, of Connecticut, and a member of the Appropriations and Aeronautical and Space Sciences Committees, said the proposed defense budget "fails to make needed increases" for military programs.

In discussing his memorandum, which was issued last week but made public only today, Secretary Gates emphasized that he wanted to do all in his power to perfect the Joint Chiefs and preserve them as a body because "I believe in it."

The Secretary thus confirmed that his memorandum dealt with one of the major criticisms of the Pentagon. General Taylor, in his book, "The Uncertain Trumpet," called for an end to the Joint Chiefs and their replacement by a single chief.

General Taylor said that from 1955 to 1959 there were at least 23 split papers presented to the Secretary of Defense by the Joint Chiefs.

General Taylor also complained that the chiefs only infrequently had access to the President and almost as infrequently had the opportunity to discuss problems at length with the Secretary of Defense.

Some notable differences among the Joint Chiefs have concerned the size and deployment of ground forces, the amount of investment in strategic nuclear power, the structure of a proposed Middle East Command, the extent of authority of the Continental Air Defense Commander, the need to establish a unified strategic command to take over all strategic weapons, and the proper investment in certain types of air defense weapons.

Secretary Gates, in his memorandum, called attention to the existing responsibility of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs to keep the head of the Defense Department informed on matters before the military body, including divergencies.

"It is logical to assume that occasional divergencies in view will continue to be experienced within the Joint Chiefs of Staff," he went on.

"In view of the fundamental nature of matters which come before the Joint Chiefs of Staff for study, such divergencies are understandable. It is important, however, that such problems be resolved promptly in order that orderly planning may proceed and, where required, prompt action taken.

CONSULTATIONS URGED

After requesting in the memorandum that he be promptly advised of "any issue on which a difference of opinion is developing," the Secretary pointed out his intention for himself or deputy to meet with the Joint Chiefs when they discussed the memorandum in a formal session.

"I would like to emphasize," Mr. Gates said in his memorandum, "that the above procedure should not be interpreted as precluding any member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff from bringing to my personal attention any matter affecting the Joint Chiefs of Staff or a single service."

This appeared to refer directly to some of the complaints of General Taylor and other high Army officials in the past.

"I look upon such discussions as matters of the highest priority within the Department of Defense and will gladly make time available in my schedule for such meetings regardless of any schedule I may have."

Secretary Gates told newsmen that, as Deputy Secretary, he had undertaken such consultations with the Joint Chiefs but that the new memorandum had made it a formal requirement.

THE GATES' MEMORANDUM: SECRETARY CLEARS WAY FOR DEFENSE REORGANIZATION

(By Hanson W. Baldwin)

The memorandum announced in Washington yesterday by Secretary of Defense Thomas S. Gates, Jr., may influence an expected congressional debate on defense reorganization.

Several Congressmen have urged further changes in the Pentagon. Some would abolish the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Others would create a single Chief of Staff over all the services. Some would merge all the services. Support for these proposals, never likely to be strong in an election year because of lack of voter appeal, may be considerably weakened by Mr. Gates' announcement.

The memorandum, which requires that the Defense Secretary or his deputy sit with the Joint Chiefs whenever differences develop among them, will tend simultaneously to strengthen the Joint Chief and civilian control.

URGED FOR SOME TIME

The simple procedure ordered by Mr. Gates had been urged for some time by high-ranking officers in the Pentagon and other experts on defense organization.

Neil H. McElroy, former Secretary of Defense, who retired last month, occasionally attended meetings of the Joint Chiefs during the last part of his regime. But the procedure was not regular, either in his case or in that of any other Secretary of Defense.

Some observers believe that Mr. McElroy and other Secretaries postponed or compromised decisions when there were divergencies between the services, or made decisions on the basis of inadequate firsthand knowledge of the problems involved.

The procedure that Mr. Gates has now required, that he is known as a hard worker, and the importance he attaches to intimate face-to-face meetings with the military chiefs would seem to insure that the new Secretary will have all the facts necessary to make decisions.

MAKES IMPRESSION

This, in itself, represents a strengthening of civilian control at the top level. Moreover, Mr. Gates' implicit recognition of the desirability of some divergencies in strategic thought sets him squarely in opposition to those who advocate a single military "party line," or a single military chief for all the services.

Some officers were particularly impressed by the Secretary's emphasis on his accessibility to all the service chiefs at any time.

Thus, the memorandum is being hailed by some officers as a milestone for the immediate future in the evolution of Defense Department organization.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I merely wish to concur in the observations which have been made by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, and to say I think a most progressive, forward step has been taken by a very capable Secretary of Defense in determining that he will sit in on decisions when controversies develop, because it emphasizes civilian control over the Military Establishment, for one thing, and it will have a rather chastening effect when differences may arise from time to time. I noted with great satisfaction that this step was taken.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I thank the Senator from Illinois for his contribution. I may add that as the Senator knows and I know, when a fire starts it is much easier to put it out when it is small, and before it gets too big and spreads; and I hope the action the Secretary has announced he will take will have a comparably salutary effect.

ROCKET TESTS IN THE PACIFIC

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, we shall not improve our position in world opinion by protesting to the Russians against their making rocket tests over lonely spaces in the Pacific while we do the same thing.

If my understanding of the situation is correct, what the Russians propose to do is what we have done. Moreover, it is what we have asserted our right to do even when the Japanese protested. The area involved, as I understand, does not embrace any islands mandated under the United Nations. It is open, uninhabited ocean. The notices Russia has given are similar to those we have given to guard ships and planes against accidents.

I have just returned, Mr. President, from a 31-day trip around the world, during which I made 18 stops at oversea points. If travel does anything for a man, it exposes him to as many tides of world opinion as wash the shores of the places he visits. Moreover, it makes him realize that there are many people in the world, and that the United States is not the only country with pride and honor.

Nor can we be indifferent to what happens elsewhere. I visited the lower house of the parliamentary body in India the day Prime Minister Nehru replied to critics of his China policy.

He reminded them that China and India are big powers and that a military conflict between them would hardly be a police action; that a little war between them would not stay little; that war between India and China would engulf the world.

We sometimes forget that India, with 400 million people, and China, with more than 650 million, comprise half the population of the world. Aroused, modernized, mobilized, their manpower and their resources would be impressive and would be complicating for every major power on earth. It gave this member of the U.S. Senate pause for reflection to hear parliamentarians in New Delhi debate issues on the basis of war involvement for the United States.

Mr. President, at a later date I hope to review some of the matters which came to my attention in countries visited, where I went over both military and economic aid programs to the extent that time permitted. At this time, however, I merely wish to point out that there are many people in this world, and we do not impress them by seeking to deny for other countries privileges we assert for ourselves.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I was interested in what the distinguished Senator from South Dakota had to say about the freedom of the seas. It is true, of course, that the high seas are free to all nations, but the use of that freedom in an arbitrary fashion to the detriment of other nations is irresponsible and provocative.

The recent Russian announcement of the intention to use the Pacific for a missiles testing range is arbitrary. Hence, it is both irresponsible and provocative.

It is arbitrary because—

First. No known prior consultation was taken with nations whose interests are deeply involved in the Pacific.

Second. A large section of the ocean was set apart, close by missile-measurement, to islands which are the property of or the responsibility of other nations.

Third. The nations of the world were brusquely advised to stay out of the area.

Fourth. No ships or planes have been provided to patrol the area in order to warn the unwary away from the danger zone.

Fifth. No consideration has been given to nations whose fishing and transportation industries may be damaged by the arbitrary interference.

Sixth. Other areas—the Arctic, for example—are available for testing. These are remote areas of little economic importance, areas of minimal interference with the rights of others.

Seventh. The test, coming as it does at this time in an ocean of great signifiance to American security and commerce, is bound to be interpreted as casting doubt on the peaceful professions of Mr. Khrushchev. It is, to say the least, to use a Russian phrase, not in the spirit of Camp David.

Eighth. The arbitrary setting aside of an unpatrolled area in the Central Pacific by the Russians is not in the same category as our use of similar areas for testing. In those cases, we acted only after attempting to get agreement on international control of weapons. Moreover, we used areas for the tests close to territories under our control, and we patrolled them. And when damage was done to others, we paid for the damage. These tests, finally, have not been resumed for 18 months. We are trying now to obtain a multilateral ban not only on such tests but on all nuclear tests.

Ninth. Nor is the Russian-announced missile test similar to the Canaveral range tests. The latter are far from the vital interests of the other missile powers. These tests can, in no way, be considered provocative. They were in process long before the spirit of Camp David came into being. Moreover, the Canaveral range operates with the approval and cooperation of nations whose territories neighbor upon it.

I have before me a magazine entitled "Aviation Week," containing an article entitled "Space Technology," in which is shown the location of the tracking stations in the Carribbean and the South Atlantic. It is my understanding that agreements have been reached with every foreign country having a direct interest in the matter. The area has been placed in little danger, although there have been, if my memory serves me, test missiles which have gone off their course. Those countries did not receive a notice only 8 days before the missile tests were supposed to start. There was no arbitrary action.

No consideration is given to the feelings of this country; to others who have regular navigation routes; to the feelings of the Japanese, who have fishing rights. No consideration is given to the feelings of the people who occupy the general area of that vast expanse of the South Pacific.

If international law is deficient in this respect, I think it ought to be corrected, so that regulation can be applied to all nations which have a vested interest in international law, in the waters of the world.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I simply wish to say to the Senator from Montana, I did not know until after I had prepared a part of my statement this morning that the Senator had made any statement on this subject. My remarks were prompted by the statement which I saw the other day which was attributed to former President Truman.

After reading the morning newspaper, I called the State Department earlier today to find out the facts. I was told that so far as they had been able to determine the facts, what the Russians are proposing is what we did in the Pacific—what we did and asserted our right to do after the Japanese had protested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BUSH in the chair). The time of the Senator has elapsed.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for an additional minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, we are not conducting any experiments of this nature of which I am aware in the vicinity of the Kamchatka Peninsula or the Bering Sea.

So far as this particular incident is concerned, I would have hoped that the Soviet Union would have discussed it with the nations which have a vital interest in that area of the world. It appears to me that what the Soviet Union is doing is setting aside something on the order of 27,000 square miles—an area in extent, I believe, approximately 200 miles wide and 300 miles long—and saying, in effect, "This is Mare Nostrum. This is our sea; and here we are going to carry on these tests."

If we are to have international comity, and if we are to have summit meetings to consider these matters, then I think we ought to get together ahead of time and, if need be, call a special meeting of the United Nations, at which meeting there could be devised some means of working out an agreement to regulate and to control international waters, except for the littoral of the countries concerned. Or, if there is to be a summit meeting, we could make this one of the top items on the agenda for consideration at that time.

There is obviously a need for some international regulation of the use of the high seas by all nations for any purpose of this kind; that is, the testing not only of nuclear devices but of missiles as well.

The rights of all nations become involved in this matter. The destruction of fish, the inconvenience to transportation affects all, however limited or indirect the effect may be on some. If these tests are to go on, the need is for them to proceed in a regularized fashion so as to minimize the inconvenience to others, so as to reduce their provocativeness, so as to avoid damage to others and to provide compensation for it when it occurs by accident.

SCHENECTADY UNEMPLOYMENT HEARINGS

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I have just returned from Schenectady, N.Y., where on Friday the Senate special Committee on Unemployment Problems held hearings on economic conditions in the Mohawk Valley area. These hearings were highly successful, and I am hopeful that they will provide guidelines for Congress in dealing with unemployment problem areas throughout our land.

The Mohawk Valley is a fine area, with a proud cultural and historic heritage. Its economy is diversified. There is found there an excellent and highly skilled labor force. The valley has a pleasant climate, and many wonderful recreational and cultural assets. At the moment, unemployment in the area is high, but certainly not critical.

The people of the Mohawk Valley are by no means discouraged. They are working hard to solve their present difficulties. Cities throughout the valley have cooperated closely with the New York State Department of Commerce in the Department's efforts to attract new industries to the State. Furthermore, they themselves have organized intensive programs of self-help to revitalize their economy and to attract new industry into the area. Their efforts are meeting with heartening success. The economy of the valley is moving forward. Employment is on the rise. Optimism is the spirit of the day. Although much hard work remains to be done, I am confident that the people of this area will be fully successful.

As an illustration of the worthy efforts being made on the part of the people of the Mohawk Valley, I call attention to the work of the Schenectady industrial development program. This program has a very unique and certainly appropriate name—GUTS, Inc. Spelled out in action, GUTS means "Gear Up for Tomorrow in Schenectady." This is an attitude which I greatly admire. It allows no room for defeat or lethargy.

Mr. President, I salute the leaders of GUTS and the many men of action from other communities throughout the valley for the fine work they have devoted to the strengthening and rebuilding of the economy of the Mohawk Valley.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a statement made by Mr. Lewis B. Harris, its general chairman, describing the work of GUTS, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GUTS, INC.—"Gear Up for Tomorrow in Schenectady" is a communitywide self-help movement with the objective of creating economic opportunity for Schenectady citizens by—

(a) Making existing businesses so outstandingly effective that they capture a share of America's growing markets.

(b) Attracting new businesses to Schenectady.

A specific GUTS goal is 10,000 new jobs by 1963.

GUTS is different from efforts of thousands of competing communities in that the responsibility for creating economic opportunity is not relegated to a few affluent citizens or institutions but is in fact a cause being vigorously pursued by business, government, clergy, labor, education—everybody, demonstrating the truth of the GUTS slogan "150,000 people with a purpose."

GUTS is carefully organized with specific responsibility assignments and thorough orientation of all individuals assigned to GUTS positions so that they precisely know their own responsibilities, the overall organization objectives, and the relation of their own assignments to the other positions in the organization.

The community spirit and purpose is seen in the fact that in the traditional American spirit of community "barn raising," all local services, materials, facilities, and human effort required by GUTS are being provided at no charge. The GUTS office pays no rent. Its staff are all volunteers. Ads and commercials are run free by local newspapers and broadcasters. Its brochures are prepared and printed free. Prospective employers, when in Schenectady, pay no hotel fees. Their meals, transportation, and entertainment are provided at no charge, and so on.

GUTS believes and Schenectady County intends to demonstrate that in the final analysis the success of a business depends not on technology or location, but on people—skilled, intelligent, outstanding people who are enthusiastic about their jobs and their employers—people who expect to be well paid and intend to be worth it.

In a country in which the traditions which made it great are all but forgotten, GUTS represents a return to the old values; 150,000 people are reaffirming their belief in making their own opportunities; in working skillfully, intelligently, enthusiastically in preparing themselves and their community to make the maximum contribution to businesses who see their opportunity in the community's energy.

Many businesses apparently have been finding newer, industrially speaking, sections of the United States more attractive than the older sections of which Schenectady is an example. We believe that in such action they will find themselves on the same road they are hoping to avoid but simply at an earlier place in time—a road characterized by self-seeking groups who will relentlessly pursue their partisan interests without concern for others or the total system of which they are a part.

What is needed is a new road entirely different from the one habitually followed of late. This new road is characterized by cooperation and a demonstration that individuals and groups can find a way to develop and pursue a common purpose without subordinating individual and group purposes and losing individual and group freedoms.

All new roads must begin somewhere. It is GUTS' contention that the start of a new road which emphasizes America's treasured values is to be found in Schenectady.

GOOD NEWS ON CANCER RESEARCH

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, an article written by William L. Laurence and published in the New York Times of Sunday, January 10, 1960, contains heartening news on the progress of research on cancer being conducted by the Sloan-Kettering Institute of Cancer Research. In his excellent analysis of a report published by the institute, Mr. Laurence states:

> The evidence so far suggests that the Sloan-Kettering scientists are on the road to an anticancer vaccine.

Mr. President, this is wonderful news. The American people can be proud of the fine work being done by scientists of the Sloan-Kettering Institute, and of many other similar research organizations, to find a means of curing and preventing one of man's most dreaded diseases. Undoubtedly, a great deal of hard work lies ahead in the battle against cancer. In this light, we must consider the good news from Sloan-Kettering as an indication of the need to dedicate our maximum effort and the fullest possible resources to this great battle.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Laurence's article be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SLOAN-KETTERING INSTITUTE REPORTS ON 2 YEARS OF CANCER RESEARCH

(By William L. Laurence)

The Sloan-Kettering Institute for Cancer Research, one of the world's major centers dedicated to the search for means to control mankind's second greatest killer, made public its biennial report last week. It contains a general picture of research in progress, based on more than 700 scientific reports published by the institute's staff during the 2-year period from July 1, 1957, to June 30, 1959.

Among the liveliest projects in current cancer research is the quest for means to stimulate the body's natural defenses against invading cancer cells.

When bacteria or viruses attack the body a multitude of defenses are summoned. All of the known forces that the body calls into action in its own defense are components or products of a group of related cells found in the spleen, liver, bone marrow, and lymph nodes, known collectively as the reticuloendothelial system, or RES.

ANTIBODY REACTION

The best known products of this system are antibodies, special protein molecules shaped specifically by the body to react with a particular foreign material and immobilize it. Other defensive elements include white blood cells with various functions, such as the phagocytes which eat up offending particles and the fibroblasts which wall them off, and defense-promoting chemicals such as complement and properdin.

Scientists in the solid tumor section of the institute's experimental chemotherapy division have been studying the effects of cancer growth on the vital defense network of the RES.

The test subjects are mice implanted with sarcoma 180, a vigorous, rapidly growing, readily transplantable mouse cancer. During the first few days of the cancer's growth, the report states, RES cells multiply in visible numbers, "apparently responding to the threat of the growing cancer." Other invaders, however, are handled more swiftly and efficiently during this period. Then, as the aggressive tumor continues to grow, the tide turns. The defense system, exhausted by the unequal struggle, begins to break down and finally fails completely. Bacteria, always present in the body, but ordinarily held in check, begin to multiply and finally take over. In these animals, as in cancer patients, infection is often the direct cause of death.

If, before the RES is exhausted, it is given a sudden boost, "it may be able to overcome the cancer implant," the report says.

The most effective booster tried so far is Bacillus Calmette-Guérin (BCG), which has been used for years to stimulate resistance in children exposed to tuberculosis. BCG injections, the report states, "have produced 100 percent recovery from sarcoma 180 implanted in laboratory mice." Studies are now in progress of animals with spontaneous cancers, to discover whether these have the same effect on the defense system and whether stimulation of the defenses can slow or stop their growth.

PLANTED IN EGGS

A technique has been developed in the embryology section of the experimental chemotherapy division for planting fragments of human cancer on the membrane of the fertilized egg. Depending on the type of cancer, the cells may spread throughout the embryo and young chicks may be hatched with widespread human cancer. Most of the chicks die within a few weeks, but some survive; as these mature "something within their bodies begins to destroy the cancer."

Similar studies are being carried out on cancer defenses in the rat. When untreated rats are injected with minced human cancer, the foreign cells are rapidly destroyed in the rats' bodies. Blood and tissue samples were taken from the animals 7 days after an injection with a type of human cancer now grown widely in laboratory animals and test tubes by methods developed at Sloan-Kettering. Fresh human cancer tissue was exposed to these blood and tissue samples for 1 hour and then implanted into rats pretreated with cortisone and X-ray.

"Ordinarily, in rats so treated," the report states, "injected human cancers will grow—hundreds are grown this way every week—but these human cancers do not. They had been killed by antibodies manufactured in the body of the rat."

BROKEN CELLS

In a second group of experiments, the human cancer cells were broken by grinding and then separated into five fractions containing different cell components by whirling in the ultracentrifuge. Each of the five fractions was injected into a different group of animals, but blood samples from only two of the five groups were toxic to the cancer cells. These blood samples not only killed cells in the test tube but, when injected into animals, killed cancer cells planted in them 2 or 3 days previously.

These two active anticancer fractions are the only two containing fragments of a canal-like system known as the endoplasmic reticulum, a network believed to connect the cell's outer membrane with the nucleus and other key chemical control points. "Do these canals, and perhaps the membrane itself, contain some specific substance that spells 'foreign' or 'cancer' to the body and signals it to mobilize its defenses?" the report asks.

What may turn out to be the most significant studies of all are those of cancer defenses in man, which in many ways parallel those going forward on laboratory animals. Human cancer cells were implanted in two groups of volunteers: healthy inmates of the Ohio State Penitentiary; and advanced cancer patients from the James Ewing Hospital of the city of New York.

"In the healthy men," the report states, "the cancer implants promptly evoked a strong defense reaction. There was some initial growth but within 4 weeks all the cancer had been destroyed. In contrast, in the patients with advanced cancer, the implanted cancer cells grew vigorously. Clearly, healthy persons have a resistance to implanted cancer that is weak or lacking in patients with advanced cancer.

"Second implants of cancer cells were made in both groups of volunteers. In both, the cells were rejected with greatly increased vigor. Thus, additional resistance could be induced to implanted cancer, just as it can to a viral or bacterial invader.

SECOND IMPLANT

"When cancer cells of different types were used for the second implant, the reaction was less vigorous than with the same type, but more than that seen on the initial implant of cells. This was particularly interesting and important information; it meant that the resistance is partly specific for the particular type of cancer, but all cancers so far tested (the total is now seven) do share some common resistance-evoking factors.

"Even when killed, the cancer cells retain these factors, just as killed or inactivated virus particles, as in the Salk polio vaccine, may evoke resistance to disease carried by the live virus. Injection of the killed cancer cells produces no characteristic nodule under the skin and no inflammation, but when a second implant is given, the rejection response is as prompt and vigorous as if the first had been made up of living material."

The defense-evoking factors shared by the cancer cells were "clearly not present in the normal cells the investigators were able to study, but the studies are not yet adequate to permit generalization," the report states. The evidence so far suggests that the Sloan-Kettering scientists are on the road to an anticancer vaccine.

ADDITIONAL FEDERAL JUDGE FOR THE DISTRICT OF KANSAS

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, during the adjournment of Congress a number of citizens of my home State of Kansas conferred with me regarding the matter of an additional Federal judge for the district of Kansas.

There is pending on the Senate Calendar an omnibus judgeship bill which includes an additional judge for our district, and I sincerely hope that we may get early action on it.

The U.S. District Court for the District of Kansas for many years was presided over by a single district judge. Authorization in 1945 for an additional temporary judicial position expired within a year, because of the death of Judge Helvering. An additional permanent judgeship was finally authorized in 1949. However, the business of the district has continued to expand, and in April 1954 the Judicial Conference of the United States recommended the creation of a third judgeship for the State. This recommendation has been renewed annually for the last 5 years.

Since 1941, the number of civil cases commenced annually in the district of Kansas has tripled. In that year 291 civil cases were filed compared with 954 in 1959, as is shown in the table from which I shall presently quote. For the last 9 fiscal years the civil caseload has risen almost steadily, and the backlog has also increased, but at a somewhat lesser rate. This is due not only to the hard work of the resident judges, but also to the use of visiting judges from other districts who have been sent in to handle the large volume of business. The civil cases filed, terminated, and pending at the end of each year for the last 9 fiscal years has been as follows:

Fiscal year	Commenced	Terminated	Pending on June 30
1951	554	578	336
1952	555	505	386
1953	661	584	463
1954	792	665	590
1955	736	798	528
1956	800	787	541
1957	727	775	493
1958	940	880	553
1959	954	948	559

The civil caseload of 477 cases per judge commenced in this district in the fiscal year 1959 was the second largest nationally, and compares with the national average of 215 such cases. Diversity of citizenship cases and habeas corpus proceedings instituted by petitioners in the Leavenworth Penitentiary are important factors in the business of the district. Habeas corpus cases on the average do not require much time for hearing, but often the decision of the constitutional questions involved and the writing of opinions are burdensome. On the other hand, the diversity cases weigh heavily upon the time of the judge because a considerable proportion of these cases reach trial.

In addition to this heavy civil caseload the district has a slightly heavier than average load of criminal cases. Excluding the immigration cases which occur only in volume in the 5 districts touching the Mexican border, and which by and large require very little time per case for disposition, the criminal caseload per judgeship of 139 cases in Kansas is larger than the national average of 108 criminal cases. The criminal caseload has remained at approximately the same level for the past 3 years.

While population per judge is by itself not the sole criterion of the number of judges needed in a particular district, it is a factor which should be taken into consideration. Kansas, with 2 district judges, had an estimated population in 1959 of 2,140,000. The population of other States having three judges is as follows:

Estimated population, July 1, 1959

State:
Wisconsin	4,010,000
South Carolina	2,417,000
West Virginia	1,965,000
Oregon	1,766,000
Arkansas	1,744,000
Delaware	454,000

The population of Kansas was less than that of two of the States listed and larger than that of four of these States.

The State of Washington, with a population of 2,823,000, has 4 judges; and Oklahoma, with a population of 2,276,000, has 5 judges.

There can be no question in my mind that the workload in the Kansas Federal court district is such that in the interest of those who have suits pending before that Federal district court and who are entitled to early decision of their cases an additional district judge should be provided.

PROPOSAL THAT THE SECRETARIES OF THE ARMY, NAVY, AND AIR FORCE BE MADE UNDER SECRETARIES OF DEFENSE

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I am informed that yesterday my colleague, the distinguished junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON], said on the TV program "Meet the Press" that the Secretaries of the Departments of the Army, Navy, and Air Force should be made Under Secretaries of Defense—to strengthen the organization of the Department of Defense, and to contribute to the security of our country.

I call to the attention of my colleague and old college classmate, Senator SYMINGTON, and to the attention of the Senate the fact that on February 3, 1958, and again on September 15, 1959, I introduced in the Senate bills to accomplish what he proposed yesterday; that is, to make the Secretaries of the Army, Navy, and Air Force Under Secretaries of the Department of Defense. Senate bill 2728 is now before the Senate Committee on Armed Services, and I am hopeful that the interest of the Senator from Missouri will be shared by other members of the committee, and that they will seriously consider it. I must say that the proposal has attracted interest in many quarters, as evidenced by editorials previously placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

In the Congress and throughout the country, there is much talk about the inadequacy of our defense structure. Many seem to be looking for some magic solution, or rely solely on the expenditure of billions of dollars. I point out that the bipartisan Hoover Commission report of February 28, 1949, on the Organization of the Department of Defense, and the letter of former Secretary of Defense Robert A. Lovett to President Truman on November 18, 1952, as he went out of office, and the reports of the Rockefeller Commission in 1953 and 1958 pointed out the divided authority between the Secretary of Defense and the three Department Secretaries, and stated that unified authority of the Secretary of Defense should be assured.

The Hoover Commission recommended, as my bill proposes, that the service Secretaries be made Under Secretaries of Defense for the Army, the Navy, and the Air Force.

I recall that there served on that Commission, in addition to Mr. Hoover, former Secretary of State Acheson; the Commission was truly a bipartisan one. In addition, Senate bill 2728 would give authority to the Department of Defense to centralize procurement now divided wastefully between the departments. More important, it would give authority to the Director of Defense Research and Engineering, now Dr. York, to take charge authoritatively of the functions of research and development, now split between the three Departments, with resulting duplication and waste.

The present organization has been described as a "federation," with the Departments exercising autonomous power, and with the Secretary of Defense often limited to the function of coordination—when he ought to be in charge. It is obvious that the Secretaries of the Army, Navy, and Air Force, although patriotic and able men, must be champions of their services, if they are to have their support; and, as civilians, they must rely in great part on the information supplied by the military services they represent. This division of authority might have been tolerated years ago; but today, when the defense budget approximates $40 billion and may go higher, and when, more important, the very security of our Nation and the prospect of peace depend in great measure upon an effective defense structure and upon rapid progress in research, the people of the Nation cannot tolerate duplication in research, waste in procurement, and the split interests of the military departments.

I welcome the support of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON]; and again, I ask the Committee on Armed Services to consider seriously this proposal, which I have advanced now for 3 years.

Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky.

DR. OMER CARMICHAEL

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, on September 11 a little over 3 years ago, President Eisenhower said:

> I think Mr. Carmichael must be a very wise man. I hope to get some advice from him because he pursued the policy that I believe will finally bring success.

The President did meet a few days later with Dr. Omer Carmichael, then serving in his 11th year as superintendent of the Louisville, Ky., city school system. While this recognition of his work was one of the highest honors bestowed on Dr. Carmichael, it was typical of him that he had said: "I've never sought honors nor do I want them. I just want to do a good job."

In his quiet but firm and supremely able way, Dr. Omer Carmichael did an outstanding job in whatever tasks lay before him—of which the desegregation of our schools was but one among his efforts to provide the best education possible for the children in his charge.

Now Dr. Carmichael is dead. But the life of the community he helped to shape will continue to do honor to his perseverance and resolution of character, to his sense of duty, and to his calm nobility—just as his work will go on in the finest of living memorials, the daily work of the hundreds of men and women who owe, in part, their education to him.

At this time, I know the people of Kentucky extend their sympathy to Mrs. Carmichael, and to their three children. I wish to pay my own respects to a man whom I knew as a conscientious, thoroughly professional, and warmly human educator—a man of spirit and purpose.

Dr. Carmichael was born on a cotton farm at Hollins, Ala., in 1890, and financed his own education at the University of Alabama, where a cousin, Dr. Oliver C. Carmichael, later served as president. His degree in mathematics, his knowledge of Latin and Greek, his experience as a teacher, his work as a superintendent of schools in Alabama, Florida, and Virginia, gave him broad background for his 14 years of service as superintendent of the Louisville schools.

On the day the Supreme Court announced its decision in the Brown case in 1954, Omer Carmichael said:

> It will be my purpose to implement that decision with no effort to sidestep—no effort by subterfuge or sharp practice to defeat the purpose of the Court.

And while his accomplishment of quiet desegregation of the Louisville public schools may be recognized by the Nation as his crowning achievement, Kentuckians will also mourn a fine educator, a valued adviser, and a good friend—a man of principle who held the respect of his city, his State, and his country.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point an editorial regarding Dr. Carmichael, from today's Louisville Courier-Journal.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Louisville (Ky.) Courier-Journal, Jan. 11, 1960]

OMER CARMICHAEL: A DEDICATED ORDINARY MAN

Omer Carmichael would have been the last person to wish to hear himself described as an extraordinary man. Indeed, he typified the ordinary man at his best; the decent, unassuming, conscientious American who so often confounds the skeptics by rising to meet a challenge, moral or physical, with bravery and an unswerving instinct for the right thing to do.

It was thus that Mr. Carmichael, until 1954 a good but unremarkable superintendent of a good but unremarkable public school system, rose to meet the challenge of integrating the white and Negro schools of Louisville. Most of his fellow superintendents, many of them, it is true, lacking the consciousness of public approval and support that Mr. Carmichael knew could be counted upon here, retreated in confusion and postponed the inevitable day of reckoning.

Omer Carmichael met the challenge simply and directly. Immediately the Court's decision was made known, he announced: "It will be my purpose to implement that decision with no effort to sidestep, no effort by subterfuge or sharp practices to defeat the purpose of the Court."

For 2 years thereafter, he talked, explained, listened, and prepared. The result was that Louisville's integration of schools, when it came, was a model for the Nation. It was quiet, dignified, without ugly incident. And the one man to whom most credit accrued was the superintendent of schools.

This was not the only accomplishment of Omer Carmichael's career in Louisville. Our school system steadily improved under him.

The lot of the teacher, the education of the student, have advanced in the years he spent here. But the story of school integration in Louisville will remain his accolade. Here was a southerner by birth and upbringing, who realized at once that the habits and prejudices of a lifetime could not be allowed to stand against the law of the land. A good man has left us, and he is sincerely mourned.

PRESERVING PADRE ISLAND AS A NATIONAL SEASHORE: A PLACE OF TRANQUILLITY AND NATURAL BEAUTY

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, an excellent editorial in the New York Times of Sunday January 10, 1960, serves to remind us that soon the Senate and the House will have an opportunity to act on legislation designed to preserve several national seashore and park areas, and that the time in which to preserve these areas is short—the need critical.

Among the projects under consideration is S. 4, a proposal to establish a national seashore area on Padre Island—a 117-mile-long island with a beautiful sand beach stretching along the coast of Texas in the Gulf of Mexico.

Last month in considering the Padre Island Park proposal, Texans from all walks of life were highly pleased to have the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. Moss] and members of the Senate Interior and Insular Affairs subcommittee staff, hold public hearings in Corpus Christi. They did an unusually outstanding job of gathering the facts. They inspected the island from the air and heard testimony from more than 40 witnesses.

Among those who testified was the Honorable Conrad L. Wirth, Director of the National Park Service. He has since informed me that the hearings constituted one of the most overwhelming endorsements for a park project he ever has attended.

The editorial in yesterday's New York Times correctly points out that "only legislative action can assure the preservation of the best such areas—like Padre Island—which still exist." The editorial also states the challenge to us as a people. Are we to be less mindful of our natural heritage than were those of the boss-and-corruption-ridden 1870's and 1880's, when the park system was started and Yellowstone preserved?

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the editorial from the New York Times of January 10, 1960, entitled "Room To Breathe."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ROOM TO BREATHE

When Yellowstone was established as the first national park in a remarkable burst of prescience by the 42d Congress in the unlikely year 1872, the American domain seemed to be limitless, stretching over thousands of uninhabited miles and untouched country. Yet in the decades since then almost all of the great wilderness has disappeared, the forests have been cut, the rivers polluted, the mountains defaced, the grasses burnt, the game decimated, the long, clean, white miles of ocean beach contaminated and exploited.

This has been the sorry story of our country's physical development—inevitable, perhaps, but nonetheless destructive of so much of the natural beauty and inherent recreational and spiritual values that belong to the American land. Now the forces of expansion and destruction are increasing their pressures with spectacular speed and intensity on the little that remains of untouched tranquillity and natural peace in the open spaces of America.

Only legislative action can assure the preservation of the best of such areas that still exist. Years of investigative and survey work by public and private agencies have determined where they are: the upper Potomac, Cape Cod, several places on the Great Lakes, an island off Texas, two or three spots on the Pacific coast, the Cascade Mountains of Washington, the Great Basin of Nevada, and so on. The National Park system must be expanded to include such areas, and a national wilderness system must be established by law to insure their permanent preservation. The legislation is prepared; we are confident that public sentiment is behind it.

The exploiters are, as usual, a major stumbling block. Will the 86th Congress of 1960 be more timorous, more subject to pressures of special interests, more reluctant to take bold affirmative steps for the public good than that old Congress in the corruption-ridden, exploitative days of 1872?

RAVENSWOOD, W. VA., POSTAL FACILITY IS DEDICATED; AUTOMATION AND POLITICAL PATRONAGE DISCUSSED

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, it was my privilege on Saturday, January 9, 1960, to participate in dedication ceremonies for the new U.S. post office facility at Ravenswood, W. Va., The gathering was presided over by the Honorable John D. Hoblitzell, Jr., a former U.S. Senator from West Virginia, and chairman of the Greater Ravenswood Chamber of Commerce dedication committee. Also present was another former U.S. Senator from West Virginia, the Honorable Chapman Revercomb. These West Virginians are, of course, well known to many of my colleagues.

Walter J. Purdy, a member of the chamber of commerce dedication committee, delivered the address of welcome in the stead of Mayor Pearl O. Milhoan, of Ravenswood, who was unable to attend. The program chairman was introduced by Ravenswood's acting postmaster, W. James Blackburn.

Kenneth L. Rabidoux, Assistant Director of the Post Office Department's Real Estate Division, spoke as the official representative of the Department, and told those who attended the dedication event that the new Ravenswood Post Office "is one of approximately 3,000 built by private enterprise and leased to the Department under the unique commercial leasing program initiated by the Postmaster General, Mr. Summerfield." And he said that "12,000 more of the Nation's 35,000 post offices must be replaced because of obsolescence and deterioration, in order to make this Nation's postal service fully adequate to meet the future postal requirements of its citizens."

Mr. Rabidoux had earlier pointed out that "last year Americans mailed 61 billion pieces of letter mail and over one billion parcels. Combined, these figures represent two-thirds of the world's mail and represent an increase in volume of 120 percent in 20 years," he said, and remarked that, in order to keep ahead of this continuing growth, a gigantic overhauling of postal facilities has been initiated. Then he pointed out that in "the massive overhauling" are provisions for mechanizing the handling and distribution of mail in the so-called "gateway" post offices. Mr. Rabidoux called the "metro-mail" coordinated program still another breakthrough in mail handling.

Representative KEN HECHLER, of the Fourth West Virginia District, the other scheduled speaker on the dedication program, declared that "political patronage, political jobs, and political influence ought to be cleaned out at all levels of government, and I'm going to do my best to see that it is done, whether in the post office or the taking of the census or anywhere else."

Stating that "the only place where political appointments should be made is at the very highest level of government, where policymaking positions should be filled by those who are in accord with the program of the elected executive," the diligent and capable Representative further asserted:

Postmasters ought to be taken out of politics, postal employees should be promoted on merit, and if I have anything to say about it I'm going to put a stop to these political hacks running around with pieces of political litmus paper to stick in the mouths of Government employees.

I also advocate that in West Virginia the 1960 census be taken by unemployed West Virginians instead of by "political hangers-on" At a time when West Virginia has the highest rate of unemployment in the Nation and thousands are suffering, it would make a lot of sense to award these census jobs to those in need, instead of based upon "political pull" dictated by a political boss (the Republican State chairman) in Clarksburg, W. Va.

What large business would survive today, Representative HECHLER asked, "if its president insisted all employees belong to his own lodge or graduated from his own school and belonged to his church? Honestly, ability, and efficiency are not confined to one political party. America was founded as a land of equal opportunity and if we forget that fact we may become a second-rate power.

The Ravenswood High School Band, under Director James F. Porter, provided music for the event, while Reverand Walter Elwood, pastor of the Ravenswood First Presbyterian Church, and Rev. Paul Bell, pastor of the Ravenswood First Baptist Church, prayed the invocation and benediction. The color guard for flag-raising ceremonies was furnished by Ables-Rayburn Post No. 118 of the American Legion.

Ravenswood, situated along the beautiful Ohio River—one of our country's most important inland navigable streams—is a progressive and rapidly developing community, the principal industry of which is the large Kaiser aluminum facility nearby. Kaiser's Ravenswood Reduction Works and Rolling Mill afford employment for more than 3,000 in the production of primary aluminum sheet, plate, circles, foil and building products. This enterprising organization has brought growth and stability to the economy of the Ravenswood community, and has been a most timely and welcomed addition to the West Virginia industrial complex.

The Greater Ravenswood Chamber of Commerce has been aggressive and diligent in developing the potential of its area of influence and representation, and Ravenswood's interests are likewise well represented in the State legislature by State Senator Paul R. Moore of that city, and Delegate Wayne W. Hughes. Both Senator Moore and Delegate Hughes were present for the post office dedication ceremonies.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

WE MUST HAVE THE B–70 WEAPONS SYSTEM

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, within recent weeks, while Congress was in the adjournment period, the Department of Defense announced that in response to a Presidential budgetary directive, the development program for the B–70 bomber has been "stretched out" and "cut back" to the point where it no longer represents any serious attempt to develop and produce this bomber as a weapons system.

I rise to question the wisdom of this decision, to suggest in fact that it is a blunder which may have the gravest consequences to our national security, and to urge that the decision be reversed.

At the present time, and throughout the first half of the next decade, the Soviet Union possesses and will possess a commanding superiority in operational ICBM's, the intercontinental ballistic missiles.

Last winter, the then Secretary of Defense, Mr. McElroy, admitted that if the Soviets produce missiles at what we believe their capability to be, and we produce those we now plan to, the Soviets will maintain a lead of approximately three to one throughout the early 1960's.

In addition to this, we know from the accuracies we have achieved with our present ICBM, the Atlas, that it is possible to pinpoint a target many thousands of miles away with almost incredible precision.

The President of the United States mentioned that the other day in his state of the Union message. It is a fact that we have even greater precision than the President stated in his state of the Union message.

We have absolutely no reason to believe that the Soviets are behind us in this field. We must assume that it is possible for them to achieve a circular error probability at least as good as that which we can achieve.

This accuracy, without revealing any classified materials, is such as to convince me that the Soviets soon could pinpoint an attack on Vandenberg and the other missile bases we have built and are building and completely obliterate them all in the first strike, leaving us without any retaliatory strike force in the missile category after that first blow.

What I am saying is that while the President of the United States was calling attention to our accuracy in the missile field, we have to assume that the Russians have the same accuracy. If the Russians have the same accuracy they can knock out the Vandenberg Base on the first strike, and they can knock out the missile bases being built in Wyoming and in other places, because the Atlas sticks up like a church on fire.

Until we develop and have operational a large force of ICBM's which either are mobile, or can be hidden, we will not have that indestructible missile retaliatory strike force which is the keystone of our security.

We are working on such missiles now, but they are not yet perfected.

And until the time when we have an operational force of sufficient Minuteman missiles in service with a number of them operating from mobile bases, and until we also have a fleet of nuclear submarines fitted with operational Polaris missiles at their stations, we must depend upon the manned bomber capable of delivering nuclear bombs to potential enemy targets as a major part of our deterrent force. In fact, many authorities believe we will always need to maintain manned aircraft as part of our total deterrent force.

Currently we depend on the B-47 and the B-52, and we may count on their capabilities being improved in the years ahead by such advances as air-to-surface missiles and improved electronic countermeasures. We are building a handful of B-58s.

But we also know that a large portion of Soviet scientific and military effort is devoted to defense against the manned bomber. We have every reason to suspect that such are and will be the improvements in their defenses that year-by-year effective penetration by these aircraft will become more and more difficult, until at some point they will cease altogether to be an effective deterrent.

I have reason to believe that our present bombers are becoming less and less useful because of the greater perfection in the Soviet defenses.

If we are to maintain the manned bomber as part of our deterrent force, we must have a long range supersonic bomber with cruise and target speeds of at least mach 2.5 and a range of more than 7,000 miles. We must have the B–70.

The B–70 will have a cruise and target speed of mach 3, triple that of the B–52, cutting target time from continental U.S. bases from 8 to 12 hours to 2 to 3 hours, at an altitude of 80,000 feet, compared to only 50,000 for the B–52. A B–70, or a squadron of B–70s in the air over the North Pole could deliver payloads to Soviet targets, such as Moscow, in 20 minutes. The B–70, according to the most reliable information which I can gather, would be at least four times as effective in penetrating defenses as the B–52, can be operated from existing B–52 bases with an equal reaction time, and can be employed on airborne alert.

The B–70 will make obsolete Soviet defenses designed to counter present subsonic aircraft. The very knowledge that we are seriously developing such a weapons system will enormously complicate the Soviet defense problem. It will complicate it in at least two ways—by forcing diversion of scientific manpower to a new and presently unnecessary task, and by forcing an expenditure of rubles to defend against the B–70 far larger than the amount it will cost us to develop and build it.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield?

Mr. ENGLE. I am delighted to yield to my distinguished friend from Missouri, who has a very broad fund of information on this subject.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, I congratulate the Senator from California for his remarks with respect to the B–70 airplane. I had hoped to stay and listen to all of the Senator's address, but unfortunately have an engagement uptown. However, I did want to listen to as much of his discourse today as possible.

It is true, is it not, that if this B–70 program goes through as now planned by the administration, in effect the plane is being written off?

Mr. ENGLE. I should say that the B–70 is being "scrubbed" as a weapons system. I shall point out later in my remarks that it is intended to build a prototype, but that that project will be stretched out. What I am saying is that we need the B–70 now, because we shall need it during the period of time when we shall not have an indestructible retaliatory missile capability.

The President said the other day in his state of the Union message that we can hit within a 2-mile circle. We can do a little better than that. So can the Russians—now or soon. That would knock Vandenberg Air Force Base flatter than a flitter. Anyone who knows anything about intercontinental ballistic missiles must be aware that after the first strike we would have nothing left in missiles.

Mr. SYMINGTON. It is true therefore, is it not, that today the U.S. Air Force does not have under research or development a single airplane?

Mr. ENGLE. I think that is correct.

Mr. SYMINGTON. I never thought I would see the day when that statement would be made on the floor of the Senate.

I congratulate the Senator upon his address and hope our colleagues will carefully read the able exposition he is giving today of this serious problem.

Mr. ENGLE. I thank my distinguished colleague from Missouri.

Let me say to the Senator from Missouri that I wholly concur in the statement which he made on a television program last night, with respect to the reorganization of the Defense Department.

Mr. SYMINGTON. I am very grateful to my friend for saying that.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ENGLE. I am delighted to yield to my friend and colleague from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. The answer which the junior Senator from California has just given to the junior Senator from Missouri must be measured, it seems to me, beside the fact that, as I understand, not one plane was flown in World War II which was not already on the drawing boards when World War II broke out. I ask the former Secretary of the Air Force if that is not true, if the Senator from California will yield for that purpose.

Mr. ENGLE. I am glad to yield for that purpose.

Mr. SYMINGTON. To my knowledge, the statement of the able Senator from Tennessee is entirely correct.

Mr. GORE. The timelag, then, between the actual effectiveness of a plane and its completion on the drawing board raises a very serious question for the early 1960's, so far as modern, efficient, comparable air power is concerned. Is that true?

Mr. SYMINGTON. There can be no question about it.

Mr. ENGLE. Let me say to my distinguished friend from Tennessee that if we went to work on the B–70 we could have it in inventory and in operation by 1964. That is about when we shall need it.

What I am saying is that today we do not have a bomber which can be sure of penetrating the Soviet defenses. The capability of the B–52 and the other bombers to get through is limited. So the President of the United States says to us, "We can drop an intercontinental ballistic missile into your hip pocket." We certainly can; and so can the Soviets. The Atlas, sitting like church steeples on Vandenberg Base and in Wyoming, or wherever else they may be, would be knocked as flat as the country around them; and we would not have a thing to strike back with that we can depend upon to get through. We are scrapping the B–70.

I referred to some of the assets of the B–70. I said it would complicate the problems of the Soviets in two particulars. It would require them to divert some of their scientific manpower into that field. It would require them to divert money to perfect their defenses against the B–70, which would make obsolete their present defenses against the present type of manned bomber.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. ENGLE. I am delighted to yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. I understood the Senator from California to say that at the present time we do not have an American bomber that can penetrate the Russian defenses.

Mr. ENGLE. No. What I said was that it is becoming more and more difficult for our bombers to get through, that they are becoming less and less useful. Within a very short time the competence of present bombers to reach their targets wil be under very grave question.

Mr. MORSE. I am glad I raised the question, for two reasons. I think the statement I made is the statement of a correct impression which I believe the Senator's language left in the RECORD. I am glad to raise the question for that reason.

I raise a second question. Do we know whether or not Russia at the present time has bombers which can penetrate our defenses?

Mr. ENGLE. I think we do; and I think we know that some of them could get through. But I will say also that some of us believe that the Russians have spent more time and money on air defense than we have. There is no defense now against an ICBM. No one has designed a defense against the intercontinental ballistic missile. There is no way to stop it.

Mr. MORSE. I wish to express my appreciation to the Senator from California for this speech, because I think we find ourselves in a somewhat paradoxical situation, in which we, as Senators, owe a duty to educate the American public.

We all know that the ultimate goal is the goal of disarmament. But the paradox, I think, is that in order to assure our best chances for disarmament, we shall have to put ourselves in such a position that Russia will recognize that she has everything to lose and nothing to gain by a continuation of the mad armament race. I have taken that position for several years in the Senate. Not so many years ago the Senator from Missouri and I were 2 of 11 Senators who voted for defense expenditures which we insisted were necessary. Subsequent events proved us to be right.

So I think the American people need to face up to the fact that we have the responsibility for placing our air defenses in such a situation that they will be conducive to a real foolproof, inspection-proof, complete disarmament, a program which in my judgment is the only hope for peace.

The paradox in this situation is that if we continue the kind of armament race in which we are now engaged in we shall end up in a nuclear war.

The text is, Where is the stopping point? I happen to think that we cannot reach the stopping point until we can first demonstrate that we have missiles that can penetrate the Russian defenses, and until Russia understands—as I believe we had better understand, too—that if two great powers continue in this mad nuclear armament race, we may lead mankind to disaster.

Mr. ENGLE. I agree with the senior Senator from Oregon. A further paradox is the citation of the accuracy we have with our missiles, by the President in his state of the Union message, as an evidence of our strength, when actually, if we turn the case around, and realize that the Soviets must have the same kind of accuracy, what it boils down to is that until we can harden the bases for the Atlas—and that will be attempted—or until we can get the Minuteman, which can be put on a railroad train and shuttled around, so that there will be no way to catch it, the Russians have the capability of knocking out our missile bases. We have wondered why it would not be possible to keep secret the location of the missile bases. In a country like ours it is not possible, because too many people are working on them. Everyone knows where the Vandenberg Base is. Everyone knows where excavation is in progress for the bases in Wyoming. All the Russians would have to do would be to zero one or two of their continental ballistic missiles on several of our bases, and the retaliatory force of America, so far as the ICBM is concerned, would be wiped out. That is why I am saying, with respect to the B–70, that with the decreasing capability of the present bombers, it is necessary to the defense of America to have a supersonic bomber.

It is true that an ICBM, even though it cannot be recalled, may be destroyed in flight, provided that the gear to accomplish this does not malfunction, but at least the missile and its warhead are gone forever. A series of planned false alarms preceding a real attack could conceivably find us without missiles because, substantially they had been expended in vain.

The B–70, unlike an ICBM, is recallable. Its mission can be aborted. This characteristic permits us to launch the B–70 on less than conclusive information, but still withhold the ultimate decision pending the receipt and evaluation of additional information. The presence of B–70's at 80,000 feet on airborne alert over the Arctic, only minutes away from enemy targets at mach 3 speed, would make it possible for us to evaluate more carefully actions taken by the Soviets, while still remaining poised to strike an almost instantaneous retaliatory blow in the event of attack.

Moreover, the B–70, as a manned aircraft, is a recoverable weapon, which a missile is not, and can be used over and over again in subsequent strikes against residual targets. Furthermore, a manned aircraft has the power to discriminate between targets; to seek alternate targets in the event primary targets have already been destroyed; and can be employed in the role of reconnaissance to assess the effectiveness of initial strikes and provide the essential data for planning subsequent operations.

Even this is not the full story of why we need the B–70.

The B–70 could also be employed in low-level attacks at nearly mach 1; it could be used as a satellite intercepter; it could be used as a recoverable booster for launching high payload space vehicles.

The B–70 could be a first-rate military transport, capable of delivering material to any point on earth in only a few hours.

The B–70 could be the prototype, and the experimental design which will pave the way for the 2,000-mile-an-hour commercial transport.

If the United Nations ever acquires a world police force, the force to put out the brush fire wars before they become major conflagrations, the B–70 would be the ideal global police cruiser.

Now where do we stand at this moment with regard to the development and production of this remarkable aircraft?

The brief announcement made by the Air Force on November 30, while Congress was in adjournment, spoke of the B–70 program "being reoriented to a prototype aircraft program" and that this so-called reorientation involved "deferment of major subsystem development."

What this means in plain English is that the program to develop the B–70 as a weapons system has been gutted.

When I talk about a weapons system, I refer to the composite, that is, the airframe—the bird itself—plus the necessary electronic equipment for bombing, navigation, and any other activities.

What is now proposed is that we build exactly two "bare bone" vehicles, and absolutely no matched subsystems involving radar, navigation and bombing, air data, electronic countermeasures, mission and traffic control, and power pods.

In other words, we propose to build two airplanes and then fit them out with gear designed for planes of only one-third their speed, which will cut the B-70's capability practically to the point where we might as well not have it at all.

In my opinion, this decision is one more example of how this administration is willing to gamble our very national survival in an attempt to balance its budget. In the fiscal year 1961, this decision will save about one-fiftieth of 1 percent of our defense spending. In return for this relative pittance, we are trading away at least one, perhaps several, year's development time on a weapons system which might well be the critical factor in our deterrent force, years of precious time which all the money in the world cannot buy back for us once they are gone.

No one hopes more fervently than I that the day will never come when it will be necessary to use a nuclear warhead, whether via missile or manned bomber.

But we do not advance the cause of world peace, nor the cause of successfully negotiating with the Soviet Union on steps toward that peace by refusing the advantages which our technology offers us.

Mr. President, I say this decision virtually to eliminate the B–70 as a weapons system is absolutely wrong. I call upon the Congress to make it clear to the administration that full-scale development of the B–70 and all its essential subsystems be continued full speed, properly funded, even if this involves some reorientation of priorities by this administration.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ENGLE. I am delighted to yield to the distinguished Senator from Idaho.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I should like to commend the Senator from California for the fine comments he has made on the floor of the Senate this afternoon.

Ironically, I am about to make an address pertaining to the subject of disarmament, which I believe is the most important problem that faces the world today.

I could not concur more heartily with the Senator from California when he points out, as he has so ably done on the floor of the Senate today, that, so long as peace rests on a balance of deterrents, we must maintain an adequate retaliatory force. I believe that the case he has made for the B-70 bomber is one that makes it incumbent upon the administration to come forward to justify, if it can, the decision it has made to scrap this weapon.

I should like to say also that, in addition to the serious situation which may confront this country in the next 2 or 3 years, the Senator from California has made a case for the B-70 bomber as a supplementary weapon which could be useful in the United States even after the missile gap has been closed.

Mr. ENGLE. That is correct; because there is still need for reconnaissance; it is still necessary to go forth to see what the situation is. We will have to have airplanes with which to do it. The B-70 could do it.

The F-108 was scrapped. I regretted that action very much. It too could have been used for reconnaissance as well as a fighter. The B–70 certainly can be used for reconnaissance. And the B–70 would still be a very useful airplane, with which America could maintain its lead in the field of aviation. We initiated that field, not the Russians. I certainly hope that we will not see the Soviets produce the first supersonic commercial airplane. One of these days there will be commercial airplanes which will fly at 2,000 miles an hour. We are likely to have subsonic commercial airplanes when that time comes, if we are not careful. Therefore, the building of the B–70 is necessary and beneficial to America beyond the point in time that I have made, in the decade of the 1960's.

Mr. CHURCH. I should like to add one other comment, which seems to me to be very important. It is this: One of the greatest dangers, it seems to me, confronting the world is the possibility of an atomic war being started by accident. The Senator from California in his address has alluded to this possibility.

It seems to me that the B–70 airplane might contribute to a lessening of this possibility if it were available in numbers to be used as the first arm of American retaliation. As the Senator has so well pointed out, such an airplane could be recalled from its mission, whereas missiles could not be recalled. Thus a miscalculation, which led to the use of missiles, in the absence of an alternative, could very well cause an atomic war by accident, which would be the ultimate folly.

So I commend, again, the fine statement which the Senator from California has made. I think it has contributed much to our understanding of this very sensitive, important problem.

Mr. ENGLE. I appreciate the remarks of the Senator from Idaho. I would say, in concluding, that the problem of whether we ought to build a B–70 weapons system is a question of priority inside the Defense budget. What I am asserting today is that that weapons system does have the priority which warrants its building, because for a while we will have nothing else to initiate a retaliatory strike if war starts.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

JUVENILE DELINQUENCY CONTROL PROBLEMS

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARTLETT in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 694) to provide Federal assistance for projects which will demonstrate or develop techniques and practices leading to a solution of the Nation's juvenile delinquency control problems.

NEW PROPOSAL TO PREVENT A DEADLOCK IN THE GENEVA NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. CHURCH obtained the floor.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHURCH. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. With the Senator's permission, I should like to suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. CHURCH. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, tomorrow in Geneva, Switzerland, representatives of the United States, the United Kingdom, and the Soviet Union will resume their negotiations for a treaty covering the controlled cessation of nuclear weapons tests. These negotiations have been going on with brief recesses for some 14 months. A treaty has not been signed, but significant advances toward a treaty have been achieved.

My purpose in speaking today is to assess the possibilities for a test ban agreement. I also wish to inform the Senate of a proposal I have made to the Secretary of State regarding a possible way to prevent a deadlock in the negotiations.

We must recall, before discussing the details of the nuclear test ban negotiations, what is their purpose. Why have we been laboring so long and so patiently for an agreement?

First and foremost, I believe it is because of the desire of the United States to make concrete progress toward the goal of controlling and reducing the world's armaments. We know that another world war would be fought with weapons of hideous destructiveness. The possibility is extremely slim that any nation could survive a nuclear war without large portions of its population dead, maimed, or otherwise afflicted with the scourge resulting from high doses of radioactivity.

Knowing what another war would be like, the major nations of the world, nevertheless, continue to invest something over a hundred billion dollars each year in producing, developing, designing, and testing weapons of war. They continue to produce these weapons because the world is divided into rival blocs separated by distrust, suspicion, and fear. No nation wishes to reduce its arms unless it is convinced that its rivals are also reducing theirs. The test ban negotiations, therefore, represent an effort to make a significant start toward the eventual but cherished goal that man may live in peace, relieved from the burden of expending vast sums and devoting enormous energies upon massive and unproductive armaments.

Another vitally important reason exists why negotiations continue for an agreement to end tests of nuclear weapons. This is apart from the need to progress toward effective arms control measures. As all of us are well aware, nuclear weapons tests produce radioactive fallout which can result in a serious health hazard. We know, at the very least, that past tests have already inflicted genetic damage upon a part of the living. Morally we have no right to bequeath disfigurement upon future generations, if this can be avoided. Moreover, the hazard from fallout will grow as newcomers, like France, add their part to the spread of nuclear tests.

The Geneva test ban negotiations, in short, have a dual function. If successful, they start the world a first step along the road toward reducing the burdens and the dangers of heavy armaments, while at the same time they free the world from the health hazard posed by further contamination from radioactive fallout.

STATUS OF THE GENEVA TALKS

The extent of progress in the Geneva test ban negotiations may be measured by looking at what has been accomplished and what remains undone. What are the points of agreement and what are the points of difference?

The three nuclear powers have agreed to 18 parts of a treaty. Many of these are purely procedural. Others, however, represent solid substantive accomplishments toward the drafting of a successful and adequate treaty.

But we must frankly admit that the issues that remain constitute the toughest obstacles to the completion of a treaty. These issues are primarily political, although some important ones are technical.

Last February, in a letter to the Secretary of State, I listed the three main roadblocks the Soviets were then placing in the path of a treaty:

First. They were demanding a veto power over the operations of the proposed international control commission.

Second. They were insisting that the requisite control posts be self-operated; that is, dominated by nationals of the countries within which the posts are located.

Third. They were calling for complicated procedures that would easily frustrate prompt action by the commission in dispatching inspection teams to make necessary on-the-spot investigations of subterranean disturbances suspected of being nuclear in nature, or of preventing these essential at-site investigations from occurring at all.

It is gratifying that the Soviets have come a long way since that time toward removing the first two of these roadblocks. On a number of items, they have receded from their demands for a veto; on others, they have made contingent offers to withdraw the veto demand.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARTLETT in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CHURCH. I am happy to yield.

Mr. GORE. I was not aware that the Soviets had come a long way in that respect. It seems to me that their suggestions have more form than substance. Would the able Senator from Idaho mind spelling out just how the Russians have come a long way?

Mr. CHURCH. Yes; I shall be happy to indicate to what extent the earlier roadblocks have been eliminated or reduced during the months between the time when I last spoke on this subject and the present time.

A year ago the Russians were demanding the right of a veto on a broad spectrum, in regard to different matters. For example, the Russians demanded the right of veto on any revision of the treaty or its annexes or the adoption of amendments thereto. If the Senator from Tennessee will permit me to do so, I should like to go down through the whole list and compare the Russians' position then with their apparent position now.

As to the first item—namely, revision of the treaty or its annexes or the adoption of amendments thereto—the Russians have now indicated their willingness to rescind their demand for a veto. Accordingly, the proposed International Control Commission could recommend treaty revisions or amendments, not subject to any veto, although any actual revision of the treaty or amendment to the treaty could not be placed into effect without the full concurrence of the three contracting powers. This is not a matter of major importance, but it is one place where a previous demand for a veto on the part of the Soviets has been rescinded.

Second, a year ago the Russians demanded the right of veto against any accusation which might be made by the Commission against any nation, for a violation of the treaty. Now the Russians have removed their demand for such a veto; and I take it that their new position is that such accusations can be made whenever it is felt they are warranted, and that they can be made without being subject to veto on the part of any of the signatory powers.

Moreover, it has been established by the negotiations that any signatory to the agreement has the right to withdraw unilaterally from the agreement upon the detection of any violation. That is one of the grounds for rescinding the agreement.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield further to me?

Mr. CHURCH. I am glad to yield.

Mr. GORE. That would then vitiate the agreement. So in one respect I say that, as I have followed the development of the negotiations, I find some difficulty in measuring the so-called concessions which the Russians advertise they are going to make with what they have actually said and the positions they have actually taken.

I will not impose further upon the Senator. I know he is making an important speech to which I am listening with great interest; but I did want to indicate that, as I have followed these negotiations carefully, I have noticed the pattern of a press statement by Mr. Tsarapkin, the chief Soviet delegate, suggesting great concessions. But when one reads the fine print of the actual position taken in the negotiations, it is a little difficult to find the two meaning the same thing.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr President, I should like to go on with the fine print, because I think it is important to read now into the RECORD, inasmuch as the question has been raised, the extent to which the position of the negotiating parties seems to have changed on the matter of a veto during the past year.

To continue, a year ago the Russians were demanding the right of veto over the appointment of the administrator. I will say with respect to this matter that their position has not changed, though ours has. In the interim, we have indicated that we feel that the matter of the appointment of the administrator is one upon which all three of the negotiating powers ought to agree, and that the administrator should be selected unanimously, provided the incumbent administrator remains until a new administrator has been selected.

A year ago the Soviets were demanding a veto with respect to the adoption of a decision to dispatch inspection groups for onsite investigation of any event suspected of being a nuclear explosion. This went to the heart of the reliability of the inspection control system. At the time of my speech to the Senate last year, this was the main reason why it appeared that the negotiations were deadlocked, and that we would soon have to abandon our efforts to reach agreement.

Since that time, however, the Russians have made a contingent offer. They have indicated that if the nuclear powers could agree upon a quota of onsite inspections that could be made in a given year, which would furnish them with some assurance that they would not be overrun with inspection teams—and now I am expressing this proposition in terms of their argument, not mine—then they, in turn, would withdraw their demand for a veto over the right to dispatch inspection teams into Russian territory.

A year ago, the Russians were demanding a veto over revision of existing methods, and approval of new methods, for observation and for types of apparatus to be placed at control stations.

The Soviets have since receded from that demand, contingent upon whether an agreement can be reached in later negotiations with respect to such new equipment as should be installed.

So I think that in these matters important changes have occurred in the course of negotiations.

Since I have gone this far into the list of particulars, I think I should add the final two particulars with respect to which significant changes have been made.

On January 30 last year, the Soviets were demanding a veto with respect to the determination of location sites of the control posts and of the routes for control aircraft flights. From this position they have now indicated they will recede if the location can be predetermined by the governments, while, on our part, we believe any such determination must be subject to review and approval by the control commission.

Finally, last year the Soviets were demanding a veto over budgetary, financial, administrative, and economic matters connected with the control organization's activities, including matter relating to the recruitment and dismissal of the supporting and auxiliary personnel.

Now, with respect to the budgetary matter, the Soviets have receded from that position and have agreed to withdraw their demand for veto if the nuclear powers in turn will agree on the composition of the control Commission and budget adoption by a two-thirds vote. This becomes very complicated and I think, in this particular, their change of position is not so great as one might be led to believe.

But I do think the total list does indicate that a significant change of position on matters of importance has occurred in our negotiations during the last year.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHURCH. Yes.

Mr. GORE. As I understand, the proposal which the Russians advertise as a great concession, and which they wish the world to interpret as a great concession, is that, instead of a veto, the Commission be composed of three Iron Curtain members, three members from the free world, and a neutral member, but that all decisions be subject to a two-thirds majority vote. If the Senator will use his mental arithmetic and find that a two-thirds majority of 7 is 5, he will see that what the Soviets propose is not a matter of substance, but of form; they still would retain a veto.

Mr. CHURCH. I could not agree more fully with the Senator; but I want to point out this relates only to the matter of budget determination of a control Commission, and not to all the activities of the control Commission. My understanding of the present position of the Russians is that, in determining the amount of the budget, they want to have adoption by two-thirds vote, which I concede gives them a veto power. However, that veto power relates to only one function of the Commission, namely, the determination of the annual budget. Therefore, the point ought not to be extended to the other matters and powers of the Commission which go to the heart of the Commission's reason for existence.

So, although I agree with the distinguished Senator from Tennessee when he raises this question I also wish to emphasize that it relates only to the establishment of the Commission's budget.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHURCH. Yes.

Mr. GORE. I concede that, but I also wish to suggest to the able Senator that it is typical of the clever moves of the Soviets to advertise a concession and claim they have made a concession when in fact what they suggest is no concession at all.

Mr. CHURCH. I will say to the distinguished Senator from Tennessee that I am fully mindful of the wily ways of the Russians. I think our negotiators at Geneva are mindful of them, too.

I would be the last ever to propose that the United States should become a party to any treaty which did not give us full assurance of protection. I am sure that we will not enter into a treaty which contains pitfalls of that kind.

In the course of my address this afternoon I expect to look at the present status of our negotiations in an objective way, and appraise very carefully the Soviet position. My purpose is to suggest a possible proposal which the United States might make should all else fail at Geneva, in the hope that we can accomplish at least a part of the objective we had in mind when we went to Geneva.

So, Mr. President, if I were to summarize the changes which have occurred in the position of the Soviet Union in the course of the past year, I would do it in this way: It seems to me that on a number of items the Russians have receded from their demands for a veto, while on others they have made contingent offers to withdraw the veto demand.

On the question of staffing the control posts, the Soviets have offered to accept our proposal, in the main, provided that we accept their offer on the budget and the composition of the control Commission.

On the third roadblock, that of the need for a certain amount of onsite inspection, little progress has been made. It was in this area of the negotiations that the hope for rapid progress toward the drafting of a comprehensive treaty, that is, a treaty covering the cessation of tests in all environments, received a setback last month. A technical working group of scientists from the U.S.S.R., United States, and United Kingdom, which met to discuss the question of the detection and identification of underground tests, failed to reach agreement on all the items on its agenda. The purpose of the technical working groups was threefold:

First. To review all new data regarding the detection and identification of underground events;

Second. To consider possible improvements in technics and instrumentation in the control system; and Third. To determine the criteria by which an unidentified event might be selected by the control Commission for onsite inspection.

Although the scientists did reach agreement on possible improvements in techniques and instrumentation, they did not reach agreement on the other important questions. The scientists, for example, could not agree on the criteria to distinguish earthquakes from explosions for the purpose of eliminating the former as being subject to inspection. Without such criteria it is difficult to see how an agreement with respect to onsite inspections can be reached.

Unfortunately, it was not only the lack of technical agreement that hurt the prospects for a treaty. The Soviet scientists accused their American colleagues of bad faith and questioned their integrity. These unwarranted accusations have added to the difficulty of reaching reasonable solutions to these vexing problems.

PROPOSALS FOR CONSIDERATION

If the scientists and the diplomats of the three nuclear powers fail to reach agreement on the question of inspection for possible underground nuclear tests, what course should the negotiations then follow?

Of one thing I am sure.. The United States cannot pack up its bags and go home without first exhausting all reasonable possibilities for agreement. We must be certain that if failure comes the guilt must rest with the Soviet Union.

Accordingly, I have written to the Secretary of State, outlining my views as to the course the United States might follow if the failure to reach agreement on the problem of inspection produces a deadlock.

Last February, when it looked as though the conference was deadlocked, I urged the United States to attempt to salvage something of value from the negotiations by calling for a suspension of all further nuclear tests in the earth's atmosphere, enforced through an international control system sufficient to detect any violations.

I wish to say at this point, Mr. President, that the distinguished Senator from Tennessee had previously made a proposal calling for our unilateral suspension of atmospheric tests. This proposal was very similar to mine, except that I hoped such an atmospheric ban could be reached by agreement among the three nuclear powers, and could be enforced by an international control system.

Last year it was my pleasure to discuss at length on the floor of the Senate with the distinguished Senator from Tennessee his proposal and mine, and, with respect to the position we then took, we found ourselves very much in accord.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHURCH. I am happy to yield.

Mr. GORE. I thank the able Senator for his generous reference.

I would hope that any stoppage of tests made by the United States would be concurred in by other countries.

In view of the fact that the United States was the first nation to conduct nuclear tests, was the only power to use a nuclear weapon, and conducted more tests than any other nation, I thought that our moral and political position in the world would be strengthened by a forthright, dramatic act on the part of the President of the United States, taking the position that, whatever other powers did, the United States was not only willing to stop contaminating the world atmosphere but had stopped doing so, and by inviting other powers to join for a given but extended period of time.

I still think there is great merit to this position, and I suggested it to the President by telegram only a few days ago when the subject was under consideration at Augusta. I think it has merit now because of the propaganda "pitch" of Mr. Khrushchev for total disarmament, which everyone desires but which all reasonable men know, in the context of the world tension today, is unachievable and, therefore, impractical and political.
